Coal board faces daunting task of restoring trust and morale

The miners' strike entered its hundredth day today. In the second of a series of articles on the effects of the dispute, DAVID YOUNG, Energy Correspondent, assesses the damage to the National Coal Board and its customers.

Whenever the miners' strike ends and whoever claims victory - both union and management will incvitably dispute even that - the National Coal Board will have to repair the damage in the pits, the damage to the morale of management and the damage to i'r customers' confidence. Then it will have to prepare Pnother battle: whether coal Chrts by its largest customer 11kd remain constrained or Ther the Central Electricity herating Board (CEGB) fuld be allowed free access by have to be abandoned.

A board official said: "The problem is that until men get back to work and machines are switched on we won't know the full extent of the damage.

Mr Frank Lyons, senior organizer in Scotland for the But with the massive investment in plant underground at each pit the total costs of the damage could be many millions of pounds. The longer the strike goes on the higher the bill will be."

Hard to remain in office

The damage done to the morale of management is harder to quantify and will be harder to repair if any eventual settlement is seen as a clear victory for the miners. At main board level the five full-time members, headed by the chairman, Mr Ian MacGregor, are government appointees, all half way through their fiveyear terms of office. They have given clear indications that they would find it difficult to remain running the industry if the miners inflict a humiliating industrial defeat. In that event it is felt that the Government would insist on appointing a new board. Many steel workers fear that halt in production would do irreparable damage to the coke ovens at Ravenscraio.

An official said that the plan was "in the form of a number of options" and would now be discussed by the corporation and the Government.

Among the options is the clousure of at least one of the corporation's five integrated steelworks, with Ravenscraig high on the list.

Stocks at the pits were 23,966,000 tonnes in December and are now 21,731,000 tonnes. In the long term new generating capacity is needed.
Oil is out of the question because of its cost and coal-fired stations will still be required. despite the Central Electricity Generating Board's present pro-

It will insist that any new investment in coal-fired stations is coupled with a liberalization of the present restrictions on coal imports.

There are doubts if imported coal could ever pose a serious threat to the coal board's relationship with the CEGB.

South African coal is ruled out politically and is in any case becoming more expensive as wages for black workers rise. South African coal also has a high sulphur and ash content. United States coal is also likely to become more expensive because of increased transport costs as the eastern seaboard pits are worked out and are replaced by coal from the inland Illinois basin. The coal from that area has a sulphur content three times higher than that of South African coal. Coal imports

Arbitration will take into account the unions' orig inal claim for a "substantial" pay rise and automatic transfe from the top point of the lowes salary grade, the employers

This gave 4 per cent alound, a further £330 to the 12,000 lecturers on the top point of the basic scale and the promise of a fundamental review of pay structure and related conditions of service. The package was originally recommended by negotiators but rejected by the further

But it has said that a lecturer

Note: There should be further growth in output in the current year based on the order position to date. The main problem currently is escalating raw material costs, due principally to increases in the proce of woodpulp, together with the deternocation of the value of the pound against the dollar. Despite two price increases margins have been evided in a number of areas. Prize university building may be demolished

By Charles Knevitt Architecture Correspondent headed by Bickerdike Allen

Cambridge University may demolish its architectural award-winning history faculty building less than 20 years after it was opened because of defects which would cost more than £1m to put right.

The building, which opened in 1967 at a cost of £300,000, received an award three years later from the Royal Institute of British Architects. It was designed by Mr James Stirling, who received the Royal Gold Medal for Architecture in

Mr Basil Shorne, acting treasurer of the university, said: "The board will consider the options open to it. These will include repairing the building, which will cost a substantial sum, or pulling it down and building another

The university withdrew writ alleging professional negli-gence against Mr Stirling in April last year, shortly after a Lords ruling in the case of Pirelli General Cable Works v Oscar Faber and Partners. Mr Stirling said yesterday the Government's keenest opponents legal sanction to levy rates much higher than those being levied by Conservative councils which consider themselves prudent spenders. Such councils keep their spending down in order to avoid Government penalties in the form of cuts in central government grant. The heaviest Labour over-

Times Guide to European Parliament

Later this year The Times Guide to the European Parliament will be published giving full details of the voting in the elections on June 14 and June 17 in the ten member states of the European Community.

The New guide will contain a review of the first five years of the European Parliament by George Clark, formerly European Political Correspondent of The Times, and Correspondent of the campaign in a survey of the campaign in Britain by Philip Webster of The Times political staff. Correspondents of The Times on the Continent will be reflecting

Geoffrey Smith

Why should the electorate have voted so differently in the European elections from the parliamentary by-elections? In the European elections Labour has come quite strong second and the Alliance has been hamiliated. Yet on the very same day as these votes were cast the Alliance was winning a triumph and Labour was coming an ignominous third in

That cannot be dismissd as that cannot be dismissed as the erratic judgment of a single constituency. The Alliance has done well in other recent by-elections, especially in Stafford and Surrey South-West, and either of the other two parties in all by-elections in this

I persist in the belief that the Alliance was at a unique disadvantage in the European elections. A nationwide contest without excitement must be difficult for a party with little money and poor organization that relies upon winning the support of many people who feel that they ought to vote and ion't much like the look of the other parties. In the European elections such people did not feel a compulsion to vote at all.

This is not an excuse for the with no fixed convictions. But its weakness.

This should be a sobering thought for Labour. The party has achieved its principal purposes in the European elections by pushing the Alliance very definitely into third place in terms of votes as well as seats. Labour also has made up a good deal of ground against the Conservatives. compared not only with the last European elections in 1979 but also with the general election.

This should be food for morale and for the authority of the leadership within the party. But it is not specially brilliant when the party that forms the Official opposition and claims to present the only serious challenge to the Government second in both votes and seats in a not particularly important election. It should do, shouldn't

Ψ,

This was just the sort of midterm election at which a good supporters could be expected to think that the elections themselves mattered much. They knew that the existence of the Government was not at stake. They were not all that pleased they saw no reason to send it a rage of encouragement. But most of them could be expected to turn out for the Conservatives again at a eneral election, when the Alliance could certainly expect to nick no more protest votes. On present form the opposition to the Conservatives would still be divided. So the Conservatives would once again be the favourites.

In the contest between the Alliance and Labour, Portsmouth and the European elections to some extent balance each other. Both Labour and the Alliance have been given new hope, and both have received a sharp disappointment. Neither to my mind has yet managed to crush the other. Yet the Conservatives would be unwise to bask too contentedly in the happiness of 2 divided opposition. The one conclusion that cannot drawn from any recent by-election or from the European elections is deep satisfaction with the Government. If the discontent were to multiply we might soon be saying not that the Government cannot be defeated because the opposition is so divided, but that the Government cannot win be-Cause it is so unpopular.

Conservatives have been accustomed to comfort themselves with the reflection that there has been no connecting link between the various misfortunes from which the Government has suffered since its general election triumph. Such troubles could therefore be ascribed to bad luck, and an ill wind most surely change.

But there has been one connexion between many of its difficulties: an insensitivity towards public opinion. The basic Conservative position is still strong. But the Govern-ment should remember that the electorate never loves those who seem to take it for granted.

Fall of Free Democrats and rise of Greens rocks German coalition

The elimination of the Free Democrats from the European Parliament and the surge of support for the Greens at the expense of all the established parties has increased the insta-bility of the Bonn coalition government and led Chancellor Helmut Kohl to describe the results as "unsatisfactory".

The final results gave the FDP 4.8 per cent of the vote less than the minimum 5 per cent needed under German election law to win seats at Strasbourg. It is the first time since the war that the party has been eliminated in a national lection, and is indicative of the disarray within the FDP.

They were helped by the fact that the Christian Democrats lost ground by comparison with the last European elections. But that is not the real explanation because the Communists themselves gained and the Christian Democrats performed much better than was expected. The Christian Democrats appear to have halted the decline which marred their performance at the general election last year. Hence the Communists can rightly claim that they did not go out in front simply because their opponents fell back, they also accelerated.

Included in their vote, how-ever, is that of the tiny Democratic Party of Proletarian Unity which took 1.4 per cent at the last European election which it fought independently. So it can be argued that the Communists did not go ahead on their own.

The Communists are nat-mally jubilant and whoever they choose as their new secretary to succeed Enrico Berlinguer will face the task of trying to maintain the impens provided by the European vote to a party which at the national level had looked lately to lack much of its old lustre. In fact the smaller lay parties were the principle losers. Even the Socialists, who have in Signor Bettino Craxi the first Prime Minister drawn from the socialist ranks, performed disappointingly. French political scene.

The Right, already weakened by its own internal divisions which were temporarily papered over for the European election campaign, is now confronted for the first time since the rise of the Poujadists in the mid-1950s by a serious threat on its extreme-right wing. The Socialists have seen support for their main coalition partner on the extreme left reduced to its lowest level in 50 years.

Both are historic events. although the latter is likely to be more durable and, therefore, ultimately more important. The Communists, who gained 11 per cent of the vote in Sunday's elections - the same as the National Front - have lost nearly half their electorate support in the past five years. There seems to be nothing they can do to stop their continuing decline. Participation in government was manifestly not a solution.

As expected, the Socialists also fared badly, their proportion of the vote falling from per cent in the European elections to 21 per Together, the ruling cent. Socialist-Communist alliance attracted only 32 per cent of the vote, a fall from the 56 per cent they obtained in the last parliamentary elections three years ago and 11 per cent less than the joint opposition list led by Mme Simone Veil.

The French are not used to being ruled by a minority Government and already there are demands from the right for the dissolution of Parliamen and an immediate genera election. President Mitterrand is not likely to succumb to those pressures, however, and the present Parliament, in which the Socialists have an outright majority, will almost certainly see out the remaining two years

The National Front's message is, however, predominantly negative. It still has no real programme. It remains to be, seen whether its latest success is just a flash in the pan - an exasperated vote of protest cast by a disillusioned electorate in the knowledge that it would have no direct impact on their lives, or whether it can be used, as M le Pen maintains, as a' launching board for a new political force in France.

The Communists are licking their wounds and wondering what they should do next.

Orders will shortly be placed for 62 Challenger tanks from the Royal

a fifth regiment of the British Army

Mr Heseltine said the one profound achievement over the past 40 years had been the avoidance of a world conflict, despite the constant reality of East-West tension. But they could not be prepared to rest on the mere absence of war. Peace between East and West had

This compared, he said, with a forecast of 4.5 per cent inflation for the fourth quarter of the year. Other benefits would also be increased and this would mean a rise in the social security budget of £1,600m bringing it to £39,000m, almost one third of

Families receiving family income supplement will also gain from the increase in child benefit I am, however, proposing that changes in the prescribed amounts should, like all other changes in circumstances, only be taken into account when a new family income supplement award is made. Howe to raise Sakharov case with Moscow:

The case of Dr Sakharov, the Nobel prize winner, and his wife, Mrs Yelena Bonner, is likely to be raised by Sir Geoffrey Howe, Secretary of State for Foreign and Common-wealth Affairs, when he visits Moscow in July, it was made clear in the House of Lords.

Lord Molloy (Lab) pointed out at question time that Dr Sakharov was at this moment being forcibly fed and his wife, who had a serious heart condition, was being refused medicine other than those available to Russians. The Soviet action, he said, was devoid of any sense of compassion and bereft of any civilized behaviour.

Lady Young, Minister of State for Poreign and Commonwealth Aff-airs, said the Government had repeatedly made clear to the Soviet Government its concern at the treatment of Dr Sakharov, It would not be appropriate to disclose any particular points the Foreign Secretary might raise when be visited Moscow in July but clearly he would have these developmer in mind.

Is it not about time that this Torv Government stopped using the police for blatant political purposes of waging a vendetta against the NUM?

Sir Michael Havers: He speaks of the paramilitary. Those of us who were listening to The World at Onc heard there were 5,000 socalled pickets - and pickets they were not, they are demonstrators and rioters in many cases.

The whole road at the end was littered with lumps of concrete, stones, bottles and bricks, mostly taken from a wall demolished by people Mr Canavan supports. If that is what he considers unfair treatment, he should think again and realize that the paramilitary comes from those Mr Canavan supports and not from the police.

Mr Patrick Nichells (Teignbridge, C) said the NUM and TUC had recommended that the number of pickets should be six and not 6,000. Sir Michael Havers: Six is a reasonable number. I would remind the House of what is the right of a picket, it is to obtain or communicate information and seek to persuade a man not to go to work.

What we have seen today, and it has been one of the worst, was far removed from that. What is going on at the frontline makes nonse of the rules. Mr David Ashby (North West Leicestershire, C) called for a Riot Act to deal with large assemblies. Sir Michael Havers: The Law Commission last September recommended a new type of unfair assembly, ranging from a very serious one down to a much lowe degree, giving an option for trial by magistrates, if agreed by both sides. One of the problems of the serious offence of unfair assembly is that it can only be tried by indictment which can lead to great delays.

Boycott failure will force Solidarity to reshape strategy

Poland's communist auth- will wait until then before orities announced yesterday making a decision. that the large participation in Sunday's council elections had dealt a lasting blow to the Solidarity underground. The unofficial turnout figure was said by the Polish press to be more than 75 per cent of the 26 million eligible voters, but there is no indication yet of how many votes were spoiled.

"The elections were a specific political test", said Mr Jerzy Urban, the Government spokesman, at a midnight press conference, "The boycott of the planting of clection announced by the underground was a failure... Our opponents wanted to turn the elections into a political referendum and in a way we are grateful for this."

Solidarity had organized complex checking mechanisms to ensure that the authorities did not try to falsify the results. The underground strategists believe that this unofficial tally - based on random five minute counting checks at polling stations and on stolen ballot papers - will not be ready before Thursday or Friday. President Marcos ordered the reactivation yesterday of a controversial 1,000-man anticrime squad with orders to "shoot to disable" criminals on public vehicles.

A similar campaign in 1982 resulted in the killing of scores of alleged criminals. Members of the elite squad, between August and December 1982, 32 criminals were killed. This figure differs sharply from reports at the time. They said that a week after the secret marshals were deployed, 45 alleged criminals were shot dead in front of horrified

The squad was armed with machine pistols, capable of firing 700 rounds a minute, and despite the "shoot to disable order, most of the victims were shot in the head or chest. After a stream of revelations about the risks of British nuclear tests, the Australian government is now likely to set up a full public inquiry. One item on the agenda of any inquiry should be the aftermath of the British test in June 1956. In the second of three articles David Watts and George Brock report on the evidence

Doctor Marston's disturbing story

up by the British nuclear tests on the Monte Bello islands in the summer of 1956 was an experiment conducted by a scientist who toured the country buying sheep and cattle carcases from farmers at £5 a time. Several areas were suffering a severe drought that year and the cash was

Dr Hedley Marston was the leading biologist on the Australian safety committee for the tests and worked normally at the Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization. Aldermaston's scientists invited Marston to set up a secret fallout testing programme at 25 monitoring points across the continent. Without anyone being told the true purpose of the experiments, animals' thyroid glands were to be analysed before and after tests for iodine-131, one of the longest-lasting radioactive iso-topes produced by nuclear ex-plosions. The tests were designed to find if long-range fallout could be contaminating milk supplies and whether strontium-90 was collecting in bone marrow.

Marston's findings were eventually published in an academic journal nearly two years after the Monte Bello tests and after a prolonged battle between Marston and his colleagues on the safety committee. They were mostly couched in restrained and technical language which attracted little attention. He was criticized for becoming emotionally involved with his research and for inaccurate work. Before his own research appeared, several of his colleagues had already referred in passing to the results and written: "They show that the levels of radiation activity introduced into the biological cycles of the "Mosaic" tests . . . are far below those expected to produce any observable effects." The analysis of the thyroids showed sharp increases in iodine-131, particularly after the second explosion in June. Before the tests began, the quantities had been negligible. At one collection point on the eastern Australian coast about 2000 miles from the Monte Belios the iodine concentration increased a hundredfold after the June 19 blast. His results suggested that the amounts of contamination varied considerably even within areas crossed by the cloud.

were present in these increased quantities, then strontium-90 also there and would also be transmitted to human food by way of milk. He referred to "other boneseeking isotopes" which might be doing the same. He was not allowed to refer to all the radioactive substances which might be found because certain ones were thought likely to reveal too much about the precise composition of the device

which had been tested. Concern about radioactive contamination of milk was not confined to Australia during those years. When a fire in a reactor at Windscale sent a radioactive cloud across northern England in 1957, thousands of gallons of milk Cumbria were thrown away

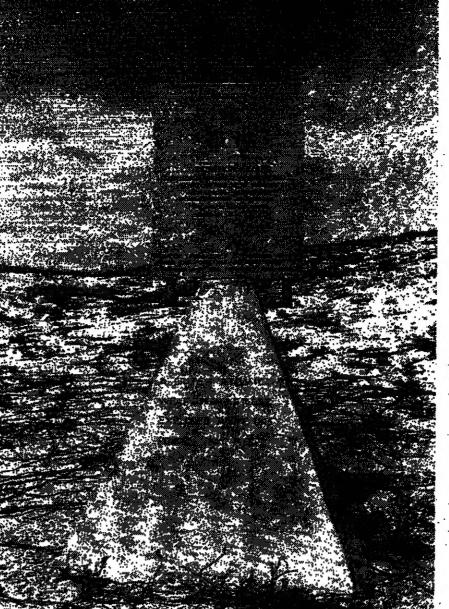

In an unpublished private report to Professor Leslie Martin, chairthe safety committee, Marston wrote: "The main hazard is internal irradiation resulting from the accumulation of long-lived isotopes within certain tissues of the bodies of individuals subsisting on foodstuffs produced on the contami-

"In particular there is a very serious likelihood that strontium-90 and its daughter yttrium-90 are now accumulating in the bones of large numbers of individuals inhabiting the extensive areas of Australia that have been heavily contaminated with debris from these tests, and that internal irradiation from these isotopes may, after a latent period of years, result in many deaths from cancer of the bone."

Marston's results confirm the picture given by the readings from the official air sampling stations that a "secondary" cloud from the second "Mosaic" blast passed from west to east across northern Australia. The official readings, although showing that the explosion deposited more fallout than any other test monitored by the airsampling stations, record only small, theoretically safe, amounts of

But the authorities were not so unconcerned at the time. Some of his colleagues had called for his programme of research to be stepped up, but when he began reporting preliminary results, the operation was never completed. Marston died several years ago, but The Times has been shown correspondence which gives his account of the harassment and surveillance he suffered at the time. He wrote later to Professor Martin: *There was unmistakeable evidence that my mail, both private and official, was being tampered with during transit - for what reason and at whose behest are possibly known to you. When we had obtained satisfactory proof that my letters were being opened while in the keeping of Her Majesty's mails, I asked my executive colleague Dr White to pass in a message to you that if this nefarious operation was not stopped immediately, I should ask for a public inquiry. This met with the usual prompt denial. However, the tampering ceased the next day, or at least it has since been conducted with sufficient care to leave no very obvious trace." The Australian Government's eagerness to damp down any awkward controversies has continued to the present day. Service veterans trying to find out whether their health was affected by their work at the tests - several thousand Australian servicemen assisted at the inland tests - have encountered extraordinary obstructions. One Quennsland veteran asked his doctor why he was reluctant to commit his opinion that he was suffering from a radiation-linked disease to paper was told: "It's more than my job's worth." Because of the security restrictions, many servicemen's records do not even mention their presence at the nuclear sites at Christmas Island. Maralinga or Monte Bello. The widow of the navigator who dropped the H-bomb on Christmas Island was told that her husband had neverserved there although she had his log book proving that he had. The more active veterans bave

It is possible that another member of the Australian safety committee might now tell a story different to the official version which he helped compile. Mr lan Dwyer, the committee's weather expert, died in 1962. Before his death, according to his family, he had become increasingly worried about fallout from the tests at Maralinga. He instructed his son to reveal that political pressure had been put on members of the committee to go ahead with testing in dangerous weather conditions One member of the family recalls that at the time of one of the tests Robert Menzies rang Dwyer personally and Dwyer was so upset by what was happening that he refused to

After Dwyer's death, government officials cleared his house of papers, including any documentary evidence dating back to the time of the tests. His son later prepared a version of the story for a literary magazine which was then visited by two men claiming to be meteorologists who wanted to check it for "accuracy". The magazine's sec-retary who handed it over to them, a South African, was told that her visitor's permission to stay in Australia would be revoked if the article appeared.

No follow-up work on Dr Marston's long-range fallout re-search has ever been published. The AIRAC report draws conclusions about the low risk from strontium-90 from measurements of French nuclear tests which took place 6,000 kms from Australia.

In 1956 a country-wide survey was begun to take bone samples from people who died in hospitals. Samples were obtained without permission from the next-of-kin until the programme was ended a few years ago. The samples were apparently forwarded for strontium-90 checks to the state X-ray and radiation laboratory in Melbourne.

Radiation-linked diseases cannot be distinguished from other diseases and there is seldom conclusive proof that radiation causes disease except after major health surveys which show higher rates of key diseases which are not explained by other factors. Many Australian doctors, now think that their government should be mounting multi-disciplinary research to survey both human and animal health which may have been affected by all the British tests.

From James Le Fanu, Th. Medical News Group. Tower House, Southampton Street,

Many doctors and scientists will be grateful to Mr Geoffrey Cannon for elucidating the causes of common diseases in our society. It is remarkable that after the enormous resources allocated to medical research the culprit turns out to be simply "the western diet". It will certainly be necessary to update our most recent medical textbooks which surprisingly omit most of his findings. Should not the Government also be considering a major reduction in medical manpower? For, despite the opposition of the special interest groups identified by Mr Cannon, the ease with which the epidemics of heart disease and cancer can be prevented by changes in diet will make thousands of medical students in the country rapidly redun-

Unfortunately, contrary to Mr Cannon's assertions, there is no simple relationship between diet and disease. Indeed the reverse is the case. All the clinical trials that have attempted to reduce beart disease or blood pressure by encouraging dictary changes defiantly produce contradictory or negative results.

From Dorothy Dennis, Shaftesbury Avenue, Leeds. There are three things I have long wanted to know about fat in diet. Firstly, how much unsaturated fat, in terms of grams or ounces, is actually essential to a healthy diet each day? This information would be more helpful to a provider of family meals than general warnings that too much is too much. Secondly, is saturated fat entirely bad? I was under the impression that some, in fact, was necessary to prevent heart attacks. Should that be so, what is a reasonable amount per day? Thirdly, is there now general agreement that the fat in fish is unsaturated? A few years ago, we were being warned that the oily fish, like sardines, herring and mackerel were just as bad

From Mrs Barbara M Wooldridge, Hallons Quay, Hallons-ford, Bridgnorth, Shropshire. obliged to take for granted. As as allergy sufferer I find that it is becoming increasingly difficult to find foods which have not been tampered with. Can the medical profession perhaps bring pressure to bear on the government and food manufacturers to investigate this disgraceful state of affairs?

From Mrs Joanna Jenkins, The Old Vicarage, Bishopstone, Swindon, Wilishire. Having read the article today on Food, Treacherous Food, and a recently, I find myself wondering what we are supposed to die

"In the end almost all do in fact die from western disease, and the argument is that western food is indeed the main single underlying cause." I expect it's true, but must we die of something, mustn't we? I have absolutely no wish for immortality, nor even for a particularly long old age.

Park Way, Crownhill, Ply-

Almost every newspaper these days has features on the rights and wrongs of one dietary regime versus another. Nov The Times joins in the debate. Please, oh please, cannot it be accepted that there always has been and always will be a wide divergence of opinion on what diet is good for the human race?

I can guarantee - and will take a bet - that within a year or so another expert will claim that one or another of the recommended foods on page 9 of bad for one.

Thankfully reason prevailed and Shona Crawford Poole tetained her delightful spot on the page to regale those of us who remain unconvinced by all the dietary arguments, that after all pigeon braised with wild rice or terrine of rabbit, or indeed both, are acceptable and succulent alternatives to steamed broccoli and no doubt much more nourishing. Peter Phillips

Wellies on the piano

aster Peter Phillips, first grandson of the Queen and currently lying sixth in line of succession to the throne of Britain and 16 other nations, has a favourite party piece to entertain visitors and infuriate his mother. He tours all the muckiest corners of the farmyard then, still clad in his junior wellies, enters the sitting room of Gatcombe Park, climbs on the grand piano, and performs an energetic clog dance on the lovingly polished

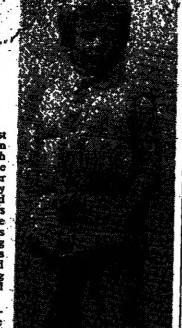

He is a highly boisterous sixear old, and more than once his mother has had to smack his bottom in full public view and drive him smartly home just as she was enjoying the Badmin-ton horse trials. His three-year old sister Zara is showing early signs of emulating him.

His parents, Princess Anne and Captain Mark Phillips, had no hesitation in sending him at the age of three to join 24 other local children at the village nursery school at Minchinhampton, Gloucestershire, a mile up the road from the family home. For the past year he has been at the private feepaying Blue Boys pre-preparatory school in the same village, where efforts to refine his behaviour are in full swing.

He has a pony called Trigger, but Master Phillips himself has no title, which might be considered surprising for the Queen's first grandchild.

He does not, of course, inherit any title by right, as his father is a commoner. But in addition to that his parents are determined that he and his sister should grow up as far removed as possible from the trappings of royalty, at least in their early years. Princess Anne has so far rejected all thoughts of a hereditary peerage for herself: she desires to withdraw as far as possible from the immediate royal circle, though the effort she devotes to her official and charitable duties is not always fully acknowledged by the popular press who find her prickly and uncoopera-

She and her husband are determined to be farmers and horsepersons first, and royals second, and they wish the same for their children. Peter and Zara Phillips will grow up knowing far more about the innards of a Massey-Ferguson tractor than the intricacies of court. Significantly, Peter's godmother is not a royal but the former show-jumper Jane Bullen, and, although he has some contact with his regal cousins, his closest playmates are the sons of the Gloucestershire farming gentry.

Currently placed sixth and falling, Peter Phillips is already safely out of the immediate line which might one day lead him to the throne. He will be further disculated by all the future displaced by all the future children of Princes Charles, Andrew and Edward. His security for the future is eventually to inherit the 700 rich agricultural acres of the Gatcombe Park estate, given by his royal grandmother to her daughter as a wedding present.

Peter Mark Andrew Phillips will one day probably be granted a title, but it will be no more than an ornament to what will be an essentially farming career. The Royal Agricultural College at Circucester would seem a likely destination for Art or the big screen?

The royal roadshow faces a future with a distinct lack of princesses. Lady Sarah Frances Elizabeth Armstrong-Jones, one-time member of the Seventh Kensington Brownies

Seventh Kensington Brownies and bridesmaid to the then Lady Diana Spencer, may well be the one to fill the gap.

Lady Sarah, now 20 and currently lying tenth in line of succession, is the most senior royal female of her generation after the Princess of Wales, and must therefore be a strong contender to join the select hand of royals who perform band of royals who perform functions and thereby earn a place on the Civil List. She is widely liked by all the family, has remained a particularly close friend of the Princess of Wales, and is a favourite of the Oueen who took a motherty interest after the divorce of Lady Sarab's parents, Lord Snowdon

Margaret. Following royal tradition, Lady Sarah showed no outstanding academic progress at Bedales School, which she left with a solitary A level in art but which was enough to win her a place at Camberwell Art School in south London. She cycled there every day from Kensington Palace and cultivated a regulation art coilege scruffiness, which could not entirely, a not-too-distant relative. Passage to India. She has spent recent months on various film sets, oddjobbing for the film producer Lord Brabourne, who as a Mountbatten son-in-law is due to resume her Camberwell art course in the autumn, but life on the film set may yet prove a stronger pull. Lady Sarah has been seen at the right balls with the right escorts, but she greatly prefers the company of her art college and other creation which she takes strongly after her much-adored father, although she takes her looks equally from her mother.

She tries hard to bridge the

Two years ago, on graduation, he set up a furniture making cooperative with three fellow Makepeace students in a workshop at Dorking in Surrey, making one-off pieces which sold better to Americans than to the home market, which Linley complains is too traditional in its tastes. The four furniture makers recently fell out, and Linley and two others have some off to set up a new workshop elsewhere.

His practical talents extend beyond wood; he recently stripped and rebuilt an old MG sports car, which he now drives to and from the flat he shares with friends at Walton-on-Hill, Surrey. COMMENT

It is, I reluctantly admit, almost 20 years since I watched our first son being born. Yet I can still hear my wife's cries, the baby's splutters on being thrust into the world, and the midwife announcing that, since he had such large feet, he would grow to be six foot tall. (She was

My memories of that occasion are among the sharpest of my life. They are also privileged ones, because in the mid-1960s only a handful of fathers attended their children's birth. But in other ways I was far less liberated. In the history of our two sons' upbringing it has been recorded that on only two occasions did I ever change their nappies. As my wife Leni never ceases to point out, in the modern marriage, I would not escape so easily today.
Nor did I have any prior idea of what fatherhood was supposed to be about. I rememered my own father as a kindly and humorous man, but since he had died when I was quite young, that example soon petered out. With a haphazard mix of instinct and pragmatism children actually liked me. (You're mad", she said.)

It appears that in my innocence and ignorance, I was not alone. That is one key finding of a concise and richly fascinating book entitled Fatherhood to be published this week. Its author is Brian Jackson, the educationist who died last year at the sadly early age of 50. As a father of four children himself, Jackson had discovered that while libraries contained shelf after shelf on read: "For fathers, see moth-many of Jackson's fathers dependent on those around it. ers", and most information on admitted that they had cried for Jackson also asked them to on filling the gap. His book is principally based on interviews with 100 fathers whose first children were born in 1980 and 1981. Jackson was startled to find that most were expressing their feelings on fatherhood for the very first time: while mothers have a wide network of friends with whom to share their feelings. Further demon-stration of what Jackson terms I muddled through, so unknow-"the cultural incomprehension" ing that I once asked Leni if our of the concept of fatherhood came when many wives answered his questions on their husbands' behalf. As he proceeded, however, Jackson found himself in the midst of a major social tran-"generation of pioneers ... marking out new dimensions of fatherhood possibly unknown to their own parents". The starting point appears to be that in contrast to 20 years ago, many fathers now attend their children's births. Most find it a motherhood, on fatherhood deeply moving moment, touch-there was almost nothing ing and revealing hitherto deeply moving moment, touchpublished at all. One catalogue unexpected emotions, and children themselves.

The intensity of that experience, initiating the "bonding" between father and child. provides a major reason why men now participate far more in their children's upbringing than before. Further impetus comes from changing attitudes towards women's roles. And as well as taking a fairer share of the chores, many fathers demonstrate a tenderness that earlier generations have been reluctant to show, Jackson terms this the "new androgyny" because of its blurring of the traditional gender roles. Some of this fathers were half-aware of this process, like the man who described how he found himself "secretly" touching his child.

Yet Jackson also reports that his social pioneers encountered many frustrations and contradictions along their route. These began even before their children's birth. One father was so excited at the prospect that he had packed his wife's suitcase, with its fresh tube of toothpaste. fancy herbal soap, and thick romantic novel, six months before the due date, But few fathers could attend preparation for childbirth classes since they are usually held in working

Only one father was invited to listen to the foetal heart-beat through the doctor's stethoscope, although one man sition. Here, he wrote, was a improvised with a beer glass upended on his wife's stomach. At the birth itself, fathers still felt themselves treated like supernumeraries, intimidated by the hi-tech event childbirth has become.

Nor were many of Jackson's fathers prepared for the dra-matic changes caused to the household by the arrival of another human being totally having children, and most were devastated when he revealed how far they had under-estimated the cost. "Not one single father", he reports, "got near the probable expense".

Jackson also found trying conflicts for his fathers between their traditional role as family provider, often returning home from work to find their children in bed. Inexocably the old imperatives reasserted them-selves, it was the fathers who encouraged the customary gen-der stereotypes in their children some still seeing boys as progenitors of the male line. While a number of fathers gave their sons their own first names, not one mother wanted the same for their daughters.

Not surprisingly, Jackson believes that education can help resolve the dilemmas of modern fatherhood. He considers the "grotesque" and argues that schools should do far more to prepare young people for the tribulations and complexities of adulthood. There is some teaching on the subject, mostly in home economics classes, but despite lip-service to equal opportunities in education these are usually confined to girls.

The problems of fatherhood

do not dissipate once children survive the gamut of illness and accidents to reach adolescence: they merely elide into unsuspected and usually illicit areas. I have to admit that it was with considerable relief that Leni and I recently greeted our younger son's eighteenth birthday. "We've done our bit" we told him. "Now it's down to you."

Bad-smelling Rose

Prince Charles may have been settling an own old score when he condemned the National Gallery's proposed extension as "a monstrous carbuncle on the face of a muchloved friend".

The architects are Ahrends. Burton and Koralek, who were commissioned by the Mary Rose Trust - of which Prince Charles is president - to design a museum in Eastney, Portsmouth to house the Mary Rose. At the eleventh hour, however, an alternative site in Portsmouth Docks became available. The Trust scrapped the Eastney plans, whereupon the architects, surveyors and engineers, submitted a bill for £155,884 for work undertaken - a third of the Mary Rose Trust's total cash income for that year. All parties are denying any link between the "carbuncle speech" and the Mary Rose fiasco, but it is said Prince Charles never forgave the architects for charging their full fees.

Testy Trudeau

I suspect that Mrs Thatcher will shed few tears over the demise of Canadian Prime Minister, Pierre Trudeau, whose successor, John "Chick" Murray, was named on Sunday. The true animosity between the world leaders, masked by their bland smiles for the cameras at the London summit, is already leaking out two weeks before Trudeau steps down. Clearly feeling he had nothing to lose at his last summit, the outspoken premier anxiously put his oar in over a draft statement on East-West relations. Mrs Thatcher, as chairman, neatly decided to close discussions there - enraging Tru-deau. "That's not a very democratic way of running things", he snapped at her. At another point Mrs Thatcher remarked dismissively that she "knew all about" Trudeau's patent plan for thawing the cold war. His suggestion that Reagan could do more to bring the Soviets back to the negotiating table went down no better. "Dammit Pierre", retorted Mr President, removing his glasses,

As the two Red Army defectors from Afghanistan enjoy a heroes' wel-come in London, I hear panic swept the Scottish Highlands the other day at a picnic laid on for the Moscow State Ballet. When the coaches carrying the 80-strong company drove away after a brief stop at Callander in the Trossachs, it was discovered that two of the Soviet stars were missing. As terrified organizers were about to start a search, the pair were spotted staggering under the weight of two nearest television shop. I am told the troupe, which has just broken box office records at the Edinburgh Playhouse, bought so many elec-tronic gadgets that a truck had to be hired to accommodate them.

So much changed by so few

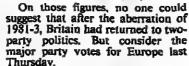

Britain voted reluctantly for parliament in which it didn't believe. Although a 32 per cent turnout cannot give a very powerful message to anyone except the most fervent anti-Europeans, the results deeply disappointed the Alliance and gave modest cheer to Labour. The Conservatives, who lost 15 seats, polled only 3 per cent less than a year ago; they are secretly relieved that things did not go worse and that the Alliance made no inroads among the farmers and suburbanites in their, heartlands. It was ironic that the country that cared least had most effect on the European election results, Britain's turnout was barely half the Euro-average, but it gave the Labour Party 15 more seats than in the old parliament, and thus reduced by 30 the right-wing majority at Stras-bourg. Few major decisions are taken there, and few of those are decided on a simple right-left basis. But there is a symbolic importance to the fact that Britain, the odd man out in Europe, keeps to its special electoral system. A 7 per cent switch of votes since 1979 produced a 19 per cent switch of seats.

However, the elections are important more for what they say about national politics than for their impact on the layout of the Strasbourg Hemicycle. In France the Communists were clobbered and the know-nothing right made a fearsome incursion on to the scene. In Germany the Greens came in and the Liberals went out. In Italy with Enrico Berlinguer's last great service to his party the Communists jumped to top. In the smaller countries, too, shock waves were felt, even if few seats changed hands. Socialist advances in Belgium and Holland and socialist setbacks in Denmark and Ireland may have their effect on the life of each national government or the date of the next election. In Britain, this was the one nationwide test of opinion between the last general election and the next, presumably three years or more away. The outcome offered a powerful antidote to the mood created by last Thursday's by-election. The voters of Portsmouth produced a result that seemed to match Orpington or Croydon, It confirmed the Alliance in its position as an equal third force. Consider the votes in the six byelections of this parliament.

The Alliance is back to its previous peak of February, 1974; but, under the first-past-the-post system, a fifth of the votes will never win significant representation for a party whose support is evenly

The turnout was very low - identical to the 1979 figure. But nothing in the results suggests that any one party was specially injured by abstention: the shares of the votes corresponded closely to the findings of nationwide polls over the past few months. However, two of the highest turnouts were in North Wales and in the Highlands and Islands, seats where the spotlight was on exceptional clashes of personality. And the 65 per cent turnout in Northern Ireland's popularity contest between its star politicians shows how interest can be transformed by the presence of major figures and major issues.

Which are we to believe - the byelections or the Euro-elections? The answer is both. The Alliance is still there and the Portsmouth victory is enough to keep its hopes alive for quite a while. Even a mere 20 per cent offers a much better bridgehead than the 14 per cent won by the Liberals in the 1979 Euro-contest. But the Alliance which, on 1983 votes, stood second in 32 of the 78 European constituencies kept the position in only 13 of them. And there was no evidence of the tactical voting that has stood them in such good stead. Their vote slumped more or less equally in seats where they started second and where they started third. They can only take comfort that the slump was exactly the same whether their standard-bearer had an SDP or a Liberal label (and even that will not please some

Some time ago the Euro-elections were being looked to as a test of whether the Alliance or Labour would come second. By the end of the campaign (if the past three weeks can be so designated), the question was whether the Conservatives or Labour would come first. In the event the Conservatives retained a clear advantage in votes and still more in seats. But it is Labour not the Conservatives that can regard the election as a victory. They see themselves as on the march again. With a 5½ per cent swing since last year's election, the party is now pressing the Conservatives close, Mr Kinnock and his strategist, Mr. Cook, can claim success.

There were no interesting excep-tions to what were otherwise fairly uniform results. Fifteen weeks into the NUM strike the swing to the Labour party was markedly above average in most of the mining areas (but not, significantly, in Nottingham). And in London the swing was 8 /2 per cent, far above the nationa level. The two really unexpected gains were in London West and London East. The safe seats of London North and London Northwest turned into marginals. And London North-east recorded the largest swing (13 per cent) in the whole country. The abolition of the GLC obviously has far more influence on voting than the CAP (in rural seats there was no serious sign of the suppresed revolt of the dairy farmers). If Mr Livingstone decides to go ahead with his demonstrative by-elections, he can do so with confidence.

But the election may have its embarrassments for the Labour leadership. Triumphs for Ken Livingstone can be worrying. So can the behaviour of 32 well-financed and articulate MEPs (18 of whom are teachers of some sort). Only 10 of the 32 are old hands; some of the veterans and the bulk of the new members are well to the left of the party. Even if they tefrain from trying a coup against Mrs Castle, they will make strident noises at Strasbourg and at home. Their remarks and their votes will certainly not enhance Britain's popularity on the Continent And they are in a position to have a significant impact on the internal politicking of the Labour Party.

The European elections are over. We did not hear much about the MEPs during the last five years and we shall not hear much about them in the next five. The votes that put them there will be analyzed in head offices and forgotten elsewhere.

Rainbow front that could go off-colour

Is there a crock of electoral gold at the end of the rainbow coalition? Or would the major party to it emerge more gelded than gilded? Frank Field MP and Michael Young, en coquettes as only radical mavericks seized by the same idea can be, have advanced the notion of an informal pact by the anti-Thatcher parties. It would involve each calling on its supporters in hopeless seats to vote tactically for their second preference instead of their first, so as to maximize the vote against the Tories. This creed of neccessary minimalism makes sense to its two proponents. In their persons, indeed, the old internalized coalition of the Labour Party could be reborn in external form. My affection for them both compels me to remind them that they may have forgotten one or two things about the parties of which they are members. At best they are hedgehogs in a world of

The one big thing is that more people dislike Mrs Thatcher's policies than support them; why cannot this be turned into an anti-Tory popular front, as Field and Young argue? There are only three reasons why not - the voters' perception of the parties, the parties' perception of each other, and their sense of the national electorate. The rainbow coalitionists believe that in a national election parties can tell their supporters to vote for someone else, and that their second preference will be the second anti-Thatcher candidate in the field.

The Labour vote has been squeezed in some Liberal-held constituencies like the Isle of Wight to less than a sixth of what it was in the unpropitious election of 1959. And this has happened even where the Labour Party has not obligingly put up far-left candidates. The effect has been particularly marked at (and for a period after) some by elections.

An ITN/Harris Exit Poll last Thursday, in a special survey for Channel 4's A Week in Politics showed that even at this low point in the Tories' fortunes, 36 per cent of Alliance voters opted for them, against 33 per cent for Labour.

The programme showed that on these preferences, combined with the 54 per cent of Labour voters who would be prepared to vote Alliance second preference, Rainbow voting in the Euro elections would have given Labour and Alliance com-bined only the same number of seats as after first preference voting. The difference would be that Labour would have lost seats because the Alliance would not be able to deliver, while the Alliance in turn gained others. This prospect will not enrapture the Labour Party, especially when it sees that it won so many of the Euro constituencies which Field and Young claimed were open to it on second preference voting, despite Alliance as well as Tory opposition. And the Alliance, without Labour votes, won none of the seven scats which could have come to it the Rainbow way. Field and Young may regret that mutual dislike between Labour and the Alliance should get in the way of the coalition makers. But that is how it is. Those who are currently infatuated find it hard to understand the bitterness of a divorce, and all the slagging and slander that follows. It is two elections too early to argue that a second marriage between the same partners could be a triumph of experience over hope - for each now hopes to bury the other.

Labour is trying to hold on to a national base, the Alliance to break out from its regional beach-heads. The Euro elections show how far Mr Kinnock has gone in restoring Labour's crumbling heritage, with an increased share of the vote and victories to cheer, Portsmouth shows how far he still has to go. before Labour can win again in Falmouth and Faversham, Plymouth and Dover. The fact that the Labour share of the vote rose even in Owen country in the Euro poll and the by-election would make a tame concession to the Alliance seem supine. For his part, the SDP leader knows that the most likely doctor's mandate he will get from ex-Tory voters is as a guarantor against socialism.

The coalitionists may argue that in spite of all this it will be necessary to unite against Mrs Thatcher as the greater evil. Perhaps such circumstances will come, as they did in India, where an overbearing prime minister found herself temporarily unseated by a coalition of disparate

It is too early to tell whether the Euro election results are conclusive evidence that the old politics was not dead but sleeping. Those who hope so will have found support for that view. Psychologically, Labour has turned a corner as important as when it elected the Kinnock/ Hattersley leadership nine months ago. At that time it was a serious sibility that Labour would be pushed into third place in the Euro poll. Its relative success can be seen not only in those it has to persuade, but in those it has provoked.

Whether it takes four years or nine, the party will try to rebuild majority support in its own way. Just as the Government has been weakened by is own electorally distorted success, so Labour has been helped by a glimpse of the abyss. Only if it fails to use to the full the talents of Frank Field and many like him, who see socialism as more than slogans learned by rote. will it need the desperate last resort of his Rainbow touch in eight years

The choice is not between that and Thatcherism in perpetuity. Sunday's results, at the very least, make an alternative government which is more than a ramshackle one-issue coalition a real possibility. The author was Labour MP for Derby North, 1970-83.

The problem and a possible solution: Young Warsaw drug addicts (left) and Marek Kotanski in a field at the rehabilitation centre

Iwona used to wear white boots. She used to have blonde hair that stretched to her waist and she used to glitter and gaze in the smoky cocktail bar of the Hotel Forum, waiting for foreign clients. "She was so pretty that she could charge dollars, not zlotics", says her mentor with some pride, Now Iwona looks like Wurzel Gummidge. Her hair, once her professional trademark, is closecropped. Her denim workelothes stop short of her ankle, her mud-caked shoes are strapped like an untidy parcel and as she comes in from the fields, joking and jostling with the other labourers, she could pass for a modest, sun-flushed godfearing country girl.

Until a few months ago Iwona was one of Poland's many thousands of heroin addicts. Polish estimates of the number of heroin users range between 120,000 and 300,000 and a high proportion of the users are addicts. No other country in the Soviet block has a drug problem of this dimension, and few countries in the world have such a rich, uncontrolled crop of poppies, the staple of home-made morphine and heroin.

By the time the heroin reaches the streets the drug is expensive. Girls like Iwona turn to prostitution to sustain the habit; teenagers, male and female, steal and deal and contribute to the crime wave. Around the corner from the Times office, in a pedestrian shopping precinct, the addicts - pupils dilated and legs buckling - collide with shoppers as they wait for the dealer

A cubic centimetre of heroin known as a "cent" - goes for 250 zloties but an addict may need 20 cents, and that will cost him 10 days average wages. The dealer takes the money and the syringe (there is a shortage in Poland) and disappears, probably to an apartment nearby. The syringe is returned full and the addict searches for a quiet doorway or stairwell where he can inject himself. Organized gangs are now begin-ning to take over the heroin operation. In a few weeks' time, when the poppy harvest begins, members of the gangs will travel out to the countryside and clinch contracts with private farmers. A large bag of poppy heads and stalks can be bought relatively cheaply. To the farmer the poppy is a weed and need not be accounted for. The poppies are then crushed and boiled, creating a morphine base. A vinegarlike chemical is added and without fuss, without complicated deals with the Mafia or the West, the criminal entrepreneur has a crude, dirty form

The mixture ready for injection is known as "kompott" - a kind of fruit stew in more conventional kitchens - but it can also emerge as a simple liquid to be drunk like cocoa. The police drug squad, headed by Colonel Grabowski (one of the most scholarly members of the Polish militia), can do little more than alert the ordinary policemen to the rules and rites of heroin dealing and occasionally launch raids on cafes where drugs are traded. But the law is inadequate; drug use is not illegal, the drug market too strong to be destroyed by isolated raids and the level of awareness of the average militiaman is not high.

Young Poles boast that they can walk through the streets smoking home-grown marijuana cigarettes and the policemen, concentrating on drunks or potential underground fugitives, notice nothing strange. The law is about to be tightened and will impose stricter controls on poppy production - but demand for heroin is now so strong that ways will be found to circumvent the rules. The hospitals, already faced with countless competing priorities and little cash, can give only the barest detoxification - equivalent to an alcoholic's "drying out" - to the addict. Afterwards, he is on his own. Even in hospital, in the psychiatric wards, the addicts try every possible ruse to obtain drugs. But just as the scope of the problem is unique to Poland, so too are the methods of rehabilitation. Some five years ago a chubby energetic man called Marek Kotanski launched an initiative known as Monar. The idea was to establish an organization that would draw on state funds, but which would be independent of the state, an organization that would be an organization that would be trusted by doctors, police and addicts. Monar, which started from nothing, now has 12 rehabilitation centres throughout Poland – three of them for under-age addicts – and has treated several hundred people. Kotanski claims his methods between Kotanski claims his methods have higher than almost any other scheme in the world. Kotanski, say his admirers, has understood the essential vanity of the addict, the sense of intellectual superiority lent users by the drug.

"We try and strip away the mask of addiction, the rag-bag bundle of attitudes that allow him to hide from bimself", declares Kotanski, sitting in one of his rehabilitation farms in Gloskow outside Warsaw. Critics - and there are many in the official state-run rehabilitation centres - say that the methods that Kotanski uses to strip away these pretensions are savage, damaging and ultimately ineffective.

secured a 50 per cent success rate -

What happens to addicts like Iwona the prostitute, Majka, a former gangster's moll in Tokyo, and Krzysztof, who overdosed, when they arrive on a Monar farm is both complex and brutally simple. On the first evening they attend a meeting of the whole farm and sitting on cushions on the floor the whole group has free licence to attack, insult and debase the new

The addict cringes and craves acceptance by the group. Slowly, day after day, he wins that acceptance by working in the fields from six o'clock in the morning until early evening. For those first six months he is forbidden to smoke or drink, he must stay celibate, be accompanied by trusties if he has to leave the farm to go to school. Some. to show their commitment to the group (and thus to giving up drugs), shave their heads. "If the addict can stick out those first months", says Kotanski, "the cancer tissue is excised from his soul".

After the first stage, the addict is as defenceless as a child and for a year the group has to teach him how to live with others and with himself. In another year, the former addict is allowed to take a manual job outside the centre, returning only at night.

The farm at Gloskow, on some 35 hectares donated by the state, resembles a hippy commune of the 1960s. Children and animals scatter and tumble around a communal dining table set under a tree, the village idiot wanders in and is given food, and everywhere addicts cook, till the fields and milk the cows. The aim is self-sufficiency, both for the farm and its inhabitants. The work ethic reigns here as nowhere else in Poland and there is something rather formidable about the discipline that the group impose on itself. At night, the worst and most dangerous time for an addict, some members of the group ("our security police" jokes Kotanski) burst unannounced into rooms and examine the arms of their friends and colleagues, searching for the mace of needles.

Outside the farm there are all the problems of the real Poland: the 15year housing queues, the shortages and the daily grind from which heroin offered escape. "Are you abaid of the outside?" I ask crophaired Iwona, the prostitute-turnedfarm girl. She thinks for a while. "Yes, at the moment, yes, very". In the room where addicts are "demasked", six black-rimmed obituary notices define, more precisely, the fears of Iwons. They record the death of six addicts, recent graduates from the farm.

Thinking over this problem I remembered the retired Indian Army colonel who had been my nearest neighbour in France. He had the utmost contempt for the customs of the natives, and would drive them from his door with a ferocious Anglo-Saxon bark, remiscent of the alliterative syllables of the method of the miscent of the alliterative syllables of Beowulf. I decided to encourage him and therefore expressed the view that the French, despite their cosmopolitan veneer, are inclined to chauvinism. "You're bang right", he replied. "T've been around a bit—India, Africa, Malaya, Arabia—and I can tell you, I've never before been in a place where they speak so few damn words of English."

It seemed to line at the time that the colonel had not quite grasped my meaning. On mature reflection, however, I began to agree with him. It really is a narrow and chauvinistic people that refuse to learn English—a language in which so many of the greatest works of literature have niscent of the alliterative syllables of immediate circumstances, they must

Just as Latin lives on in French, so does Greek live on in its modern descendant. The defender of classical learning would do well, therefore, to support the teaching of modern Greek in schools. True, this would give an advantage to Greek Cypriot children. But since his language is about the only advantage an immigrant ever has, it would be wrong to withhold it. The only question must be: does modern Greek literature justify teaching the language in which it is written?

is certainly less sure of itself than that of France. But it is an impressive attempt to graft new stock on to old, in circumstances that have been far from propitious. As our own language withers, we too must begin to graft. We should do well, therefore, to study the work of Palamas, Cavafy and Seferis. For they were divided from their inheritance, while feeling the need to inherit it, and to be at one with the history of a language which they helped to save from literary

EUROPE'S ELECTION

The results of the European elections, with turn-out down in every country except Denmark where it was apparently boosted by the vigorous campaign of the anti-EEC party, can hardly be interpreted as a ringing endorsement either of the present management of the European Community or of the European Parliament itself as an institution. Yet M Gaston Thorn's description of them as "a catastrophe" is in itself an example of the tendency to hyperbole and self-importance in the Community's institutions which, in part at least, explains' the growing indifference, tinged with impatience, of the various European peoples.

Let's keep things in pro-portion, M Thorn, Overall turnout is down from 62 to 57 per cent. All European electorates at present find it easier to get excited about national politics than about European issues presented to them in lofty and general terms, which are difficult to relate to the everyday Europe of butter-mountains, all-night wrangles between agriculture ministers, and frontier delays for incomprehensible paper work. Voters almost everywhere have used these elections, much like local or by-elections, to register mid-term verdicts, on their present government. In most cases, as usual on such occasions, the vote shows a swing against the party in power, on a lower turn-out than a general election would produce. But only in France has that swing taken on the proportions of an outright defeat.

The result in France is by far the most spectacular, and the most interesting. Three years ago the left came to power there on a fairly small swing in the presi-dential election, followed by a much larger one in the parlia-mentary election whose purpose was clearly seen by most voters as being to give the new President a majority he could Lovern with.

Now the reaction to three years of left-wing rule has produced a far more spectacular swing to the right, justly described by French commentators as "seismic" if not historic. The chief victim, though, is not President Mitterrand's Socialist Party - reduced to what would in the 1970s have been considered its "normal" 21 per cent share of National Assembly is again accounts behind them once and and reluctant ally, the Communist Party. Throughout the 1960s and 70s

it was axiomatic that, whatever happened, the French CP could always count on the support of roughly one-fifth of the voters. In 1981 it dropped suddenly to 15 per cent - apparently pena-lized for its vicious attacks on the Socialists during the preceding three years. Yet now, after three years of swallowing its pride and tagging along behind Socialist policies, it suffers a further collapse to 11.3 per cent - its smallest share since the faroff days of the early thirties, when it was little more than the revolutionary sect. The great majority of the French working class has at last recognized that this fading bunch of apparatchiks, who have renounced the word but never convincingly the reality of Stalinism, has nothing positive to offer, and has relegated it to the margin of French political life where it properly belongs.

So doing, the French elector-ate has shifted its centre of gravity very sharply to the right. The parties in power are now clearly outdistanced by the forces of the Gaullist-Giscardian opposition, even though the latter did not quite recover their combined score of 1979 and are still well short of an overall majority. The new and alarming element is the appearance of the far right in the shape of M Jean-Marie Le Pen's National Front, with almost exactly the same share of the vote as the Communists are now reduced to. That too must be kept in proportion, since we have just defined it as a marginal position: but M Le Pen is on his way up while the Communists are on their way down. He is already promising himself 20 per cent of the votes and a hundred members in the Parliament to be elected in two vears' time

Such hopes will depend on many factors. M Jacques Chirac, the Gaullist leader, who has been somewhat unnaturally muted in the European campaign where he allowed the liberal Mme Veil to set the tone, can be expected to reassert his party's nationalist identity more forcefully between now and 1986. There may, too, be a shock reaction of France's. liberal centre against M Le Pen's... success. Also, if the French the vote - but its junior partner elected on a two-ballot, single- for all.

member constituency system, M Le Pen is unlikely to win anything like the number of seats he is talking about. But President Mitterrand is pledged in prin-ciple to introduce a proportional system. The more certain it is that the Socialists will be in a minority, the greater his moentive to fulfil that pledge, with now the added thought that a split between right and extreme right might make it easier for him. him to construct a centre coalition around himself - a revival of the old "Troisième Force" governments of the Fourth Republic, excluding both extremes, in which M Mitterrand made his early career. Elsewhere in Europe the significant developments are the elimination of the German Liberals (whose alliance with the conservative Christian Democrats is clearly not appreciated by their supporters), the success of both German and Dutch "Greens" - who should enliven the Strasbourg parliament as they have done the Bundestag and, in Italy, the posthumous achievement by Signor Enrico Berlinguer of the long-desired sorpasso", making the Communist Party on paper now Italy's leading party in place of the Christian Democrats. Should that be repeated in a national election it would be of considerable psychological significance, but would by no means necessarily bring the Communists to power: Italy has more than two parties, and until further notice most of the others prefer the Christian Democrats as a coalition partner. Still, it is fitting that Italian "Eurocommunism" has received some recognition in a European election, in contrast with the drubbing accorded to French neo-Stalinism.

Next week in Fontaineblezu will assemble a group of European leaders somewhat chastened but, except in M Mitterrand's case, not really disavowed by their electorates. The latter may be said to have served notice that the Community in its present shape does not inspire them. That is hardly surprising, for its recent performance has been uninspiring. Yet there are important and inspiring things to be done, if only the leaders in Fontainebleau can get the dispiriting wrangle over the A woman's work

EUROPE'S BRITISH ELECTION Again there are qualifications. question whether it is still an It is, for instance, a fact that on 'advantage for them to remain

Like their counterparts in almost every other member state of the European Community, the minority of British electors who took the trouble to go to the European polls cast their votes largely as a comment on their own nation's internal politics. Also like electors in any other country where there was a marked change in voting patterns, they voted to register a protest against the government in power. Mrs Thatcher has suffered a blow from the left in Britain as President Mitterrand has from the right in France. As for the particularly low turnout in Britain, that may have been less a consequence of anti-Community feeling than of indifference to the largely toothless European Parliament in a country which expects rather more of Parliaments than do some of its neighbours.

For all these reasons, it is fair to interpret the result of these clections by a comparison with the General Election a year ago. No doubt, on the margin, the competing parties reaped some slight advantages and suffered some disadvantages from the specifically European aspect Some voters may have chosen to express their rooted antipathy to the Community by voting for Labour as the most anti-Community party. Others who would on general grounds be inclined lowards the Alliance may have been put off by the fact that the Alliance is the most supra-national pro-Community grouping in British politics. But it has been domestic politics that have determined the outcome, and there is no gainsaying the fact that the European elections have registered a significant revival of the Labour Party at the expense of the Conservatives which is beyond anything that could have been rationally expected by Mr Neil Kinnock nine months ago.

the basis of the European results compared with the figures at the last general election, the Government would still, despite its substantial losses, win a general election if one were held now also clear that the very bad performance of the Alliance in the European elections (which had probably been chiefly to Labour's advantage) is the consequence of special circumstances which would not obtain in a general election. This is plainly indicated by the contrast between the Alliance's European performance, with its decline of about 7 per cent, and its successes in recent by-elections (culminating at Portsmouth) which have shown an average increase of about 8 per cent. What is more, despite the fallin the Alliance's vote over the past year, its 19.5 per cent of the European poll this time is still substantially above the level of the last European election, when for the Liberals alone it was only 13.1 per cent. It would therefore be quite wrong to imagine that the European results sound some kind of knell for the Alliance's chances of being a threatening third force when the next general election gives them, once again, the advantage of full media

The Alliance has undoubtedly suffered from the fact that its support (as a new party) is highly volatile and that it could not rely on the hard core of voters who will turn out for the old parties in even the least regarded of elections. The fact that so much of its support is volatile, however. does not mean that it is unreal. Yet when all this is said, this week's disappointment for the Social Democrats and the Liberals must again raise the two separate parties under two leaders. At the next election, the voters will need to have a much clearer idea of what they stand for if they are to get anywhere near establishing their credenprobably with a comfortable tials as an alternative party of margin of 30 or 40 seats. It is government, which they have so government, which they have so far failed to do.

> For the moment, that position is again clearly held by the Labour Party which, under its new leader, has succeeded in halting its process of self-destruction and of reestablishing itself as the unchallenged principal opposition, at least for the moment. Its success has clearly been assisted by the clumsiness of political touch which has been the hallmark of Mrs Thatcher's first year in this Parliament.

But Labour's principal asset has been its regaining of working class support in a period of high unemployment and industrial disputes. It is an achievement which has rested on the truce in the party's internecine strife. Yet this could break out again when policies to be offered to the country once more have to be settled by the party and if quarrels over the reselection of MPs, with the extrusion of more moderates, once again erupt. It is because Labour's position is, at bottom so insecure, that such Labour politicians as Mr Frank Field, and others well to his left, have even gone so far as to advise a deal with the hated Social Democrats to oust Mrs Thatcher. The Labour Party would be foolish to persuade itself that its victories last week were more than a respite, encouraging though the trend is. It is when it has been forced to agree upon policies, and to disclose and explain them publicly, that its time of real test will come

Alternative fuels

From Mr Brian Padgett. Sir, The widespread utilisation of all forms of renewable energy will demand a change of attitude on the part of the authorities and the public, who have accepted as logical the concept of large-scale electric power generation remote from the point of consumption.

The need to find alternatives to our dwindling fossil fuel supplies will allow a greater role for the local ceneration of power from renewable energy sources which are by nature both distributed and cyclic.

To make the most efficient use of these energy forms will require the development of small-scale, solidstate power conditioning equipment and appliances which can accept energy whenever it is available and store it by means of a modified operating routine.

In this area the needs of the developed world for power generation and consumption equipment will mirror that of the developing

Deficiencies in 'star wars' programme

Time to end the pit dispute

From Mr Ray Mason, MP for Barnsley Central (Labour) Sir, "We can still win," my miners tell me. "We are through the pain barrier, we have learned to live with this strike. We can now carry on indefinitely." Yes, and with that determination, they can. The fuel and power base of our nation is in serious jeopardy. That affects everybody, whether stockbroker, City, insurance companies or the small traders in all our coalmining communities. It is a death knell of trade and the stockbroker belt had better be aware

The coal miners of Britain are indeed prepared to battle on. I concede that they have no democratic outlet for their feelings about the dispute and how it has been handled, but that is how it is and it is no use moaning about it.
We must therefore be prepared to see a heightening of the conflict, many industries becoming further involved, millions of unemployed venting their wrath upon this Government and an increasingly intransigent attitude by the NUM. There can be no winners,

My miners' families are suffering beyond despair. They are incurring debts on a scale which they will never recover. Yet who can doubt that they do a job for a pirtance which no industrial worker would tolerate in their conditions - and I know, having worked underground for 14 years and having represented them in Parliament for over 30 years. Scargill and MacGregor are by any test implacable enemies. The dispute is becoming more personal with every confrontation. Therefore, it must be taken from them. The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Energy must impress upon all concerned the necessity to establish an independent court of inquiry to examine the causes of this dispute, the way forward for conciliation, and the salvation of our main industrial producer of energy. Let us give the senior NCB members of the coalfields in every region in Britain a chance once more to talk to their men to save our major industrial base from serious and irrecoverable collapse.

Everybody with an ounce of political and economic sense knows that the dispute cannot go on Make no mistake about it, however, it could do so unless a major inquiry of some kind is established to avoid this despairing grind to destruction. The Government must take if out of MacGregor's hands now, before it is too late. Yours sincerely,

ROY MASON, House of Commons. June 17.

From Mrs Lea Briggs

Sir, Surely what Mrs Young (June 14) means to say is that it is the work done by both men and women which is of equal value to society: whether that work is in paid employment or whether in homebased activity should be irrelevant in today's world because both make a valuable and essential contribution to the overall scheme of things.

The greatest injustice is that society, and the institutions through which it is run and governed, always recognizes the former (by awarding money and status and sometines power) but very rarely the latter.

This injustice has been under-written in the industrialized world by the stereotyping of men as breadwinners and women as childcarers. This is so only if one is speaking of prehistoric man as hunter-gatherer; it should hardly be relevant in Britain today.

What locks people into these stereotypes now is not their own inclinations or abilities, but simply outdated prejudices and institutions which have failed to adapt to the changes in society which have taken and are taking place.

Ms Holmes (Law Report, June 13) has won what is described elsewhere in that edition as an "historic judgment" in being granted the right to work a four-day week so as to have more time to look after her two young sons.

The learned tribunal recognised that the work of winning the bread and the work of caring for the children can successfully and nat-urally be combined in one person if the rules which govern the conduct of the work-for-money side of life are adapted to meet the needs of the equally essential work-for-love side

Why, we must ask, should this approach not apply as well to a father as to a mother? With 14 million currently unemployed in Europe, the long-term prospects of full-time jobs for the boys, or anyone else, are diminishing daily. If men in society are to retain their self-esterm, and sanity, then Mrs Young's "woman-shaped pattern of life" must be allowed to apply equally to men-What we need, surely, is a "people-shaped" pattern of life. Yours faithfully LEA BRIGGS, 29 Church Road,

European union

From Mr David Hotham Sir, It is very easy for clever, opinionated men like Roger Scruton (June 12) to pour scorn on the European elections, thereby moouraging the British man in the street in probable view that Europe is nothing but a bureaucratic shambles disfigured by such patent absurdities as the butter mountain and so on.

One should remember that the FEC, for all the defects which make it a sitting target for mockery, is not

I doubt if it is worth the huge cost that is likely to be involved. I cannot see that it will lead to cent effectiveness overall for a multi-layered system) and even if that figure is applied (again optimistically) to a START-limited offensive arsenal of 5,000 strategic warheads, 500 warheads could still be assumed to reach their targets. By every count that still amounts to "assured destruction" and must raise doubts about the value of such a tattered umbrella.

That is far from being the whole story, however. There would seem to be a number of quite simple counter-measures available (penetration aids) to reduce effectiveness still further. Second, the exclusive concentration on defence against ballistic missiles leaves uncovered a large (and, because of cruise missiles, increasing) number of nuclear delivery systems with strategic consequences, Third, it is almost certainly the case that it will be cheaper to build still more warheads than to deploy effective defences.

Fourth (and of the greatest concern), any system devised will be very vulnerable to pre-emptive destruction, especially the satellites and communications links which are assumed to be an integral part of that system. They are that Mr Palumbo went to unprecedented lengths to present his project to the public on the spot and to invite their either as a statement of fact or in its implication that this department conducts an inquisition on style. I can only suppose that Mr Terry comments: that 32,000 people went to the exhibition in the Royal is referring to two of our students who obtained third class honours degrees and, as is normal in such cases, were not readmitted to our Exchange and, of the 3,000 written statements by the visitors, nearly 75 per cent were in favour of the scheme in one way or another.

Now if you can't be bothered with facts like that then you certainly can't be bothered with the really difficult question of how to achieve in architecture what T. S. Eliot aptly defined as the goal, "- an easy commerce of the old and the new".

We would all agree that that is something very difficult to achieve, but in an atmosphere that is becoming increasingly hostile to rational discourse there is little chance that the question can be properly addressed at all. Yours faithfully,

She may be interested, or appalled, to hear that it takes much longer for a Polish citizen to obtain a British visa. I appealed against the groundless refusal on January 31 and as of today, the day of the

This is astonishing. Twenty-five years ago, when Voluntary Service.

Conflict of creeds

From the Reverend D. R. J. Holloway Sir, Clifford Longley has written (June 4) very perceptively about the views of Professor Jenkins, the Bishop-elect of Durham. The nub of the problem relates to "history". On BBC Radio 4 recently David Jenkins said: "No single historical fact can be certain... historical facts are a matter of probability and doubt and uncertainty... there is absolutely no certainty in the New Testament about anything of importance". But all this is sheer nonsense! There are commonly agreed criteria that can give sufficient certainty about the past. It is not "probable" that D-Day took place on June 6, 1944; it certainly did. Nor is it "probable" that Julius Caesar had an expedition to Britain in the first century before Christ; he certainly

Professor Jenkins, in his Credo television broadcast, denied that there was "any one event which you could identify with the Resurrection." But in the duplicated letter he has sent out to critics be said

I believe in the Resurrection in exactly the same sense as St Paul believed in the Resurrection (i.e., on the basis of the accumulated testimony of the first disciples and personal experience).

This is confused. David Jenkins is confusing how he (and St Paul) came to faith with what he (and St Paul) believe. They came, he says, to faith in the same way. But David Jenkins's subsequent belief in the Resurrection and St Paul's are poles

Paul believed that there was "a datable event". And Paul believed in the empty tomb: "He was buried, he was raised on the third day" (1

Cor 15:4). Of that verse. C. H. Dodd, one of the greatest of English New Testament scholars, has written this: "The natural implication would be that the Resurrection was (so to speak) the reversal of the entombment." And he adds:

When (the early Christians) said, "He rose from the dead," they took it for granted that his body was no longer in the tomb; if the tomb had been visited it would have been found empty. The gospels supplement this by saying, it was visited and it was found empty. For these reasons is it right that David Jenkins should allow himself to go forward for consecration? We can't have bishops whose teaching undermines the truth of the Resurrection. This is not to question for a moment David Jenkins's personal faith, or to deny that he has a real experience of the risen Christ. But a bishop has to be a person who can communicate the faith. He also has to lead with the good will and agreement of the Church.

At Professor Jenkins's consecration the Archbishop would have to say: "Is it your will that he should be ordained?

The people are to respond: "It is". What if a significant proportion were to say, "It is not"?

Yours faithfully, DAVID HOLLOWAY, 7 Otterburn Terrace. Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Restoration of old buildings for practical commercial reasons was a hallmark of the group - as recently evidenced at Weatherill gave a dinner in speaker's House yesterday evening of Heads of Departments and staff the Old Deanery of St Paul's Cathedral - as was the insist-ence on the high quality of workmanship. By the end of his period of chairmanship, the company had restored more old buildings in the City than any other individual or company in its history. Willson followed this with The Unsinkable Molly Brown (1960) for which he did not write the book ("Dolce Far Niente" was one of its most popular numbers) and Here's Love (1963). MR JUSTICE CANTLEY, delivering the judgment of the court, said that the conflict between the

JR pours cold water on financial supermarkets

Mr Jacob Rothschild has changed his views on the development of financial supermarkets. Since the planned £1 billion merger of Charterhouse J Rothschild with Hambro Life collapsed last month, they clearly no longer seem such a good idea. True size is still beautiful but he doubts whether any genuinely integrated financial scrvice companies will emerge in Britain in the next two years. Addressing an investment seminar organized by stockbrokers Grieveson, Grant, Mr Rothschild was in remarkably candid mood. If nothing else, Charter-house J Rothschild was "an interesting case study" of an attempt to build a financial supermarket. JR had accumulated a portfolio of investments in a number of different financial service companies but it would be "ludicrous" to suggest that it had reached the stage of integrating these activities. The danger of putting together Charterhouse J Rothschild and Hambro Life was that the value of Hambro would be undermined by the lack of clarity at Charterhouse.

"We therefore decided that we needed a period of time to bring toegether the existing interests within Charterhouse J Rothschild before we moved any further."

He had not yet abandoned his faith in the long-term future of financial supermarkets along American lines but the management challenge in handling such a structure were "formidable".

The chief probem was the "cultural differences" that have emerged in Britain between the various elements making up the financial sector. The jobbing mentality was trading orientated and quite different from that of the stock broking or merchant banking mentality. "Bringing them to-gether is a complex task which can only be done over a long period of time." These differences were dwarfed by the cultural difficulties of integrating on an international scale.

Where does Charterhouse J Rothschild go from here? Size has already enabled the group to take part in an activity that would be denied to smaller organizations. But basically CJR's ability had always been in "interventionist" investment. The dazzling growth of Target Life, recently sold to a Morgan Grenfell led syndicate for £48m, was witness to that.

CJR's ambition over the next two years is to do the same kind of thing as they have done successfully in the past and meanwhile struggle towards integration among the businesses.

Fears behind the forecasts

Short-term statistics like the monthly Public Sector Borrowing Requirement (PSBR) can be so fogged by caveats that their relation to outside forecasts usually takes precedence over the facts and their. real significance is lost. The May PSBR figure of £1.22 billion comes in the category "not as bad as expected". City estimates had ranged as much as £1 billion

Setting expectations aside, the latest figures are not encouraging. The first two months of the financial year have produced a PSBR of £2.62 billion, just half the Budget for the year and well up on last year's £2.4 billion. Local authorities were paying money back in May, while state industries borrowed a little (reversing the order in April), leaving the Central Government Borrowing Requirement at £1.6 billion

In April and May together, revenue was up 7 per cent. spending by 9.9 per cent and the mainline supply services up 8.7 per cent. These compare with Treasury forecasts for the year of 10.5 per cent, 6.2 per cent and 5.8 per cent respectively. Not good start.

The vital missing part of the Treasury equation, which enables the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remain confident in his targets, is the summer and autumn privatization programme, which as noted here before, sould beat the Budget estimate by a mile. Unfortunately a PSBR that remains constant only because asset sales match spending overruns is clearly not neutral for interest rates.

The most intriguing element is why the City has taken to such pessimistic forecasts of monthly PSBR, money supply and the rest. The City thinks interest rates must go up because of problems in the United States and consequent pressure on interest rate differentials and the pound. As the Government claims to have no exchange rate policy, analysts must look for domestic reasons why interest rates should go up.

Whatever the intellectual approachm the City's feeling that financial and real economic forces are pushing us toward an interest rate-led short-term downturn within the recovery cycle - signalled as usual by stock markets - looks sound.

Schroders' King over the water

The wind of change continues to whistle through the cob-webbed corridors of Schroder Wagg. Or if you prefer, the last tumbrel has not yet left Cheapside. Lord Airlie, the chairman, is off later this year to take up the post of Lord Chamberlain of the Queen's Household. His successor will be Mr George Mallinckrodt, who runs the New York operation while Mr Win Bischoff, who came back from Hongkong to put life and heart in the London merchant bank, will become chief executive of the group. Thus Schroders, one of the most eminent, but not one of the most successful, merchant banking groups, has the distinction of having two German nationals running the show. Furthermore Mr Mallinckrodt will continue to operate from New York and run the subsidiary

After falling down the merchant banking league - a process highlighted last year by the damaging loss of two important clients, Thomas Tilling and P&O - Schroders has been rethinking and restructuring.

Like the three Lazard merchant banks in London, New York and Paris which recently strengthened their operating ties, Schroders is adapting to the demand for global financial services. It is moving into market-making in equities (Hongkong shares only for the time being) and will apply to become a primary dealer in gilts. Like Lazard's, Schroders' approach is still essentially one of developing profitable niches rather than trying to provide customers with everything. And doing it alone, in preference to seeking the warm embrace of a bigger partner.

Schroders' moves are belated and bold, but they are made from a still formidable base. And it was not too long ago that Morgan, Grenfell was in danger of relegation.

A major new Study is published this week by the Heuley Centre. A 350 page volume crammed with analyses and charts presenting an entirely fresh and practical perspective on the longer term future.

Two public Seminars introduce this important work: London, 22nd June . Birmingham, 5th July,

We have moved into an era of far-reaching change. A wide spectrum of fundamental questions confront us, including:

New economic circumstances: Will we see a return to competitiveness and growth for the UK? Is yet higher unemployment an inevitable consequence of new working patterns? Do we really face a crisis in energy resources?

New social realities: Will the 'inclustrial city' dwindle away in the context of 'post-industrial society'? Exactly how will the home evolve as the centre of work, leisure and education? With more time and information to hand, will consumers become ever more demanding?

New political developments. Will the Labour Party decline to become a minor regional third party? Will new coalitions or constitutional changes be forced upon politicians? The Henley Centre's new conclusions on these and many other issues challenge the conventional wisdom of the last decade. Project research was sponsored by the Telford Development Consoration.

Key speakers at the half-day Seminars will be Hywel Jones, The Director of the Henley Centre, and Robert Tyrrell, Director of the Social Forecasting Group.

The Report, over 350 pages long and featuring over 150 charts and tables, is presented in 3 parts: A. Perspective. The Historical Context

Encouraging Outlook

Extracts from the Statement by the Chairman, Mr., Alac Caggias.

The results for the year show that turnover has fallen by £893,000 (16%), and profits by £49,000 (13.8%), compared with the previous year's figures, due largely to a drop in demand for safety footwear experienced in the second and third quarters of the year. Since October 1983, demand for safety footwear has risen, enabling some ground to be recovered. A final dividend of 1.6p per ordinary share, makes a "same again" total of 3.0p per ordinary share for the year.

Since the year and a major acquisition has been made which will influence future trading results to a significant extent.

It is anticipated that the group profits for the year ending 31st January, 1985 will be in the region of £325,000. The outlook for 1985/6 is most encouraging as the full benefits of the relocation and re-organisation will then be realised and a significant increase in profits is anticipated

HELD HELD

The group has just disposed of some more parts of its machine tool business for a total of £3.8m and the talk in the market suggests it may have also found a buyer for its gas turbine business, at long last. John Brown has had talks with Hawker Siddeley about the turbine business, which could have been worth about £30m for the loss-making engineering group. But the talks broke down after the two sides failed to agree a price.

John Brown's figures are due on July 8, and some brokers are predicting that the losses could be a lot less than originally expected. Most had been looking for a deficit of £4m, but this could now be as low as £1m, they say, A return to the black year is also envisaged under the guiding hand of the present chairman, Sir John Cuckney, and one or two optimists are already predicting profits of £7m. Elsewhere, the rest of the equity was making a firm, if uninspiring, start to the new account. Selective support enabled prices to rally from a nervous start prompted by world debt and the National Westminster Bank's comments on base rates. Turnover remained low with most marketmen's thoughts turning to Ascot, which starts today usually signalling a luli in market activity.

THE FT Index, having been 3.7 down first thing, recovered to close at its high for the day 5.4 up at 821.2. The FT-SE 100 gave a clearer indication managing only a 2.5 rise to 1042.6.

Gilts spent a lack-lustre day and higher interest rates still worried by the possibility of higher interest rates. The latest Public Sector Borrowing Requirement figures made little impression, but prices did manage to trim earlier falls of Vertenday two companies manage to trim earlier falls of

Berisford looks stable with £9m sweetener

S & W Berisford, sugar trader extraordinaire, is at pains to play down the importance of its £9m-plus jump in interim profits to £41m.

Last year's comparable halftime results were ambiguous, reflecting both a £9.5m loss at the ill-fated involvement in Erlanger Tubes and exception-ally bouyant conditions in cocoa and coffee trading.

This time the underlying picture looks far more stable. The group has manoeuvred its way out of the bulk of the US tubes venture but other divisions are apparently doing no more than ticking over, British Sugar Corporation may generate some growth, but the underlying picture looks fairly unexciting.

On the scrap merchant side, Torn Martin had done well. General merchanting reflects to some extent the general economic upturn. Cocoa and coffee trading has been rewarding.

Despite warnings from other overseas traders that the going later this year will be heavy. Berisford sounds relaxed about City forecasts of £80m pretax for 1983-84, or a roughly unchanged performance on the previous year, after adding back exceptional tube losses.

At 187p, up 10p yesterday, that puts the group on a prospective p/e of under 6. The group has under performed, in market terms, during the last quarter, half-year and 12 months, possibly because a debt mountain worth perhaps 60 per cent of shareholders' funds implies a close relationship between the multiple and

But the market assessment may be wrong. By a supreme irony, Berisford tooks to have struck oil and gas through the rump of its Erlanger venture, It thus stands to gain from a hole in the ground what it lost on the pipes, to the tune of £70m or more. The shares are a speculative buy for the brave.

Gilts

Decoupling? Recoupling? Gilts are drifting these days from familiar lodestars, and landmarks like the 12 per cent yield barrier for the shorts. Yesterday, the market exhi-

traders can only work off stolid bited both greed and despair in fairly equal quantities. Easier in the morning ahead of the May PSBR figures, it failed to respond spontaneously to better-than-expected figures. Traders concentrated on the healthy overspend in supply services - up nearly 9 per cent in the first two months of 1984-85, compared with a near-6 per cent forecast. Attention in the early afternoon was still focussing on the poor crop of US data, like the record $19 billion first quarter current account deficit, the rise in US business loans of $1.4 billion for the week to June 6, and May's groaning capacity usage figures, at $1.7 per cent.

But a specific event - in this case, news that the £100m tranche of Treasury 11 1/2 per cent 2001-04 had been sold out can turn the market.

Longs jumped on the announcement, and finished the day 1/2 point up, to make a positive swing of 14 point. With futures strong, confidence may be seeping back.

Initial Services

Initial Services' rejection of the takeover bid by British Electric Traction for the 60 per cent of the shares which it does not already hold has added to the complexities of a deal which is fast becoming enshrouded in uncertainties. While both parties would like the bid to be recommended. unless a compromise can be reached this week it will be left to Initial's shareholders to make up their mind on the offer. Initial's non BET directors feel the company is worth more than the 512p a share on offer and would also prefer the consideration to be shifted more in favour of equity than cash. At the moment, it is around 60 per cent cash. Initial's result were published yesterday, a week earlier than planned, in an effort to allow the financial advisers more concrete facts on which to base their discussions Pretax profit was up by only £1.6m to £28.7m which might have been a little dissappointing for Initial as was the £41 m provision for deferred taxation which has meant a fall in shareholders' funds from £91m to 164m.

Prospects for Applied Computer Techniques look bright despite uncertainties over the future of the Sirius microcomputer, Sales of its own Apricot are set to replace more than adequately those of the US Sirius, which was outliving its use to the company.

Production of the Apricot is not running at the 100,000 a year level which has been talked about, but orders are increasing. More encouraging than the numbers produced is the geographical distribution of sales. In the present year they will be split evenly between home and overseas markets, an indication that the muchneeded penetration of foreign markets is beginning to take

One of ACT's great strengths is that it has a broud spread of interests, not only in manufacturing and distribution, but also in software and servicing. This mitigates the exposure to a collapse in one sector of the microcomputer market which coupled with a healthy research and development programme, leaves it ideally poised to exploit the changes

The shares closed down 10p at 610p, perhaps reflecting the uncertainty over Sirius.

THE HUTTON SOLUTION FOR DEEP WATER

OIL PRODUCTION

Saturday August 4 would seem to be the ideal day for a picnic. The London Weather Centre may not guarantee that the weather will be fine, but the oil industry's experts who watch the North Sea calculate that it should be bright, sunny and Harvard Business School wind-free. Conoco has chosen the day to start the final phase of its multi million pound scheme to install the world's first tension leg oil platform in the North Sea. If the oil company is willing to take the risk on the weather with its £1 billion platform, it is surely worth backing its hunch with a few sandwiches and a chilled bottle of plonk.

The installation of the tension leg platform (TLP) at the predrilled wells on the Hutton field has had its fair share of overrun of around 25 per cent.

The Hutton field is 90 miles north-east of the Shetlands in 485 feet of water, a depth which could easily be exploited by a conventional steel jacket with modular production platorm.

However, looking to the future when North Sea oil will be brought up from depths of 600 feet and more – Esso is already drilling in 2,100 feet of water west of the Shetlands and Britoil's new semi-submersible drill ship has also been designed for such depths - Conoco decided to develop the TLP concept,

TLPs are basically buoyant production platforms, fully equipped and ready for operation before floating out to the drill site, tied to the seabed by high-tensile steel rods which allow lateral but not vertical

The tension legs, forged from steel in the same way as the barrels for tank guns, can be screwed together in sections which in theory allow the platform to be installed in any depth of water.

The cost of a conventional steel jacket (the oil industry's name for the huge steel framework which is piled into the seabed and which supports the drilling and production equipment) starts to rise to prohibitive limits once is has to cope with more than 500%

Conoco has calculated that in the 20 years that the Hutton platform will be operating in the North Sea it will be hit by 5.3. million large waves. In North Sea terms large waves are those which tower above a substantial detached house, which cause the BBC to issue a gale warning and which, in engineering terms, shorten the design life of a steel platform.

North Sea.

In theory the Hutton plat-form could be disconnected from the seabed and moved to another oil field, either in the North Sea or in the Gulf of Mexico or off the coast of China. In practice its rivets and welds will be close to breaking point design contracts placed, orders for steel placed and the Department of Energy asked to give its approval to the use of TLP. Highlands Fabricators of Nigg Bay, Cromarty Firth, and McDermott Scotland, of Ardersier. Moray Firth, are two of the main contractors.

The Government watches In the year 2005 the Hutton closely the amount of money spent with British industry in proportion to expected profits from the field before giving any approval, too much for the oil company and too little for the nation is anathema to the current Conservative regime at the Energy Department as much as it was with Labour.

A technological leap-frogging was greeted with typical en-thusiasm by Mr Alick Bucha-nan-Smith, the Energy Minister, Conoco says that it chose the TLP concept for the soundest of commercial reasons: Hutton would not be profitable under conventional costs. Inflation took its toll but that, the rise in oil prices. At current world prices Hutton can still be profitable and Britain has earned a tranche of technology which it can exploit in the future in the North Sea and which British companies can capitalize on

Well today, once again, you can buy a Ford Granada with leather seats. It's the new top of the line Ghia X Executive which is now available in limited numbers; limited because the top grade hides which are supplied by Connolly take over sixty hours each to tan, soften and turn into fully dressed leather.

But, of course, you don't have to buy a Granada with leather seats if you don't want to. Those who prefer cloth will find any of the Ghia X models just as comfortable.

Imagine that you're behind the

Does the seat position need changing? Easy, it's power-adjusted. So is the front passenger seat.

Does the temperature suit you?

If not, you can always turn on the air conditioning. Believe it or not, that's standard too. It's particularly pleasant if you're ever caught in one of those frustrating summer traffic Jams.

Then again, you could always open the sun roof. That's electrically operated too. As are the windows. And the heated door mirrors.

But perhaps the greatest luxury the 28 litre Granadas have to offer is the luxury of power. No matter what you ask of them, the silky-smooth - V6 engines always seem to have so much in reserve that you never feel as if they're having to try very hard. The ease of driving is assisted by power steering which, though fingertip light at parking speed, still gives you plenty of road feel when you're driving faster.

As you'd expect, the automatic gearbox is standard.

And the suspension, while tuned to smooth your way round town, feels reassuringly firm on the open road. Meanwhile, there's a splendid display of instruments on the dashboard. An onboard computer is standard so, among other things, you can monitor your average speed and fuel consumption. An overhead console houses a row of warning lights which alert you to potential problems like low oil level and worn brake pads.

Few drivers are as well informed. But rather than read about it, why not drop in to your Ford dealer and experience the Granada first hand. It may well have the most comfortable seats you'll sit in all day.

With or without leather upholstery.

Why two new try-out systems went down

Dr Amdahl: after the high-performance market

By Kevan Pearson

Dr Gene Amdahl's plans to build a high-powered computer to run IBM software became the second recent casualty in the battle for the IBM mainframe market when it announced last week that it was to abandon the

A similar plan by Storage Technology, a leader in IBM compatible storage, had already been scrapped. Both companies' projects failed for broadly similar reasons as they attempted to develop proprietary microprocessor technologies and computer architechtures for their IBM compatible computers. But Storage Technology's project was always riskier. It was going after the small to middle range of mainframes where profit mar-gins are low and IBM is the lowcost producer. Trilogy was after the high-performance end of the market where profit margins are higher. And it had Dr Amdahl, who designed the System/360 series range of computers, which set IBM on the path to its present position.

in the ead, though, both ventures failed because they could not get their chip technology sorted out in time to compete with IBM.

Dr Amdahl had already set up a company to make IBM compatible computers - and it still bears his name. But the market has changed markedly since Dr Amdahl left IBM in 1970 to set up Amdahl Corporation. For one thing, IBM had little competition in its own market in 1970, and it was in the grip of what was to prove the longest running anti-trust case in the history of US commercial legislation.

Today the case has been abandoned and IBM has more competition in its own market from those companies such as 1986.

Amdahl which make computers compatible with IBM software programs. So IBM is leaner and more agressive than it was in 1974 when Amdahl launched its first computer. As 'a result, product life cycles have fallen considerably from the seven or eight years of the 1960s and 1970s to half that time today.

Computer technology has advanced to the stage where raw computer power is doubling every three or four years. Trilogy hoped to launch a machine at the end of 1984 which would out perform IBM's next, and as yet unannounced, generation of mainframe computers.

To do this, it had to push chip technology a step beyond what computer manufacturers are using today. It first ran into problems late in 1983 and announced its first product delays in January this year. IBM is expected to launch its so-called Sierra series of computers which will replace the present top-line series later this year.

Since January Trilogy has announced two further delays and a complete product rethink. About three weeks before the project was abandoned, it announced it would deliver less powerful machine in 1987. By that time IBM is already expected to be prepared to replace the presently unannounced Sierra series.

Trilogy's dilemma was clear: it could not harness its advanced chip technology in time to give itself a market advantage Trilogy is continuing to develop its microprocessor technology and has not completely ruled our the prospect of entering the computer market. Initially it will look for new applications for that technology. but it is not expected to be commercially available until

How Britain can plan an IT strategy

While politicians and industrialists consider the conclusions of the Economic Summit report on technology and employment which called on the Summit nations to develop a more effective policy for encouraging high technology trade, the House of Commons this week is to debate Britain's information-technology poli-cies. The Government-owned semiconductor company, Inmos, is to receive particular attention.

Such policies are crucial to the successful expansion of Britain's electronic sector, which still has a trade deficit each year measured in pillions of pounds. The National Economic Development Council has often called the Government's attention to it - but with little success.

President Mitterrand of France two years ago needed little convincing and set up cooperative projects on technology with the Summit countries in the wake of the Versailles conference. The United States as the host of the subsequent Summit, at Williamsburg in 1983, endorsed that commitment to cooperation in technology. That rhetoric was soon to disappear as the US Department of Commerce made attempts to force Europe to seek American permission before re-exporting US technology to

The offended the Europeans. The technology Summit report of last week made little attempt to disguise its criticisms of the American intransigence and is an issue which is to be considered this year.

It concluded: "The possible military application of high-technology components, products and production knowhow, and the lead in these products and technologies enjoyed particularly by Summit countries, has persuaded governments of the need for effective controls over the destination of such products and production technologies.

"Nevertheless, scientific progress, technological innovation and economic development can be maintained only if we continue to exchange scientific and technological information and encourage trade among ourselves to the greatest possible The summit conclusion underlines

the fears that have existed in Europe for the last decade - that dependance on US technology without a proper indigenous industry would be econ-omically and industrially dangerous. It was with such fears in mind that the microchip company lamos was created. A microelectronics infrastructo produce advanced designs for its information technology industry, thus ensuring that British companies would not be starved of vital semiconductor components nor dependent on foreign supply.

It is fitting therefore in the wake of the London Summit that MPs debate the future of the government owned microchip company. Attempts to sell parts of it have aroused the interest of British Telecom, Plessey, Thorn-Emi and the American AT & T over the last few years. The government vacillated over injecting the last £25m into the company, bringing its funds and allowances from the public purse to over £100m. Attempts to interest the City in funding the project in exchange for equity have not been successful.

Why? The answer is that the Government isn't sure what part the company should play in its blueprint for Britain's information-technology

Government technology initiatives so far read like a litany of disappointments

 Inmos, created by the previous Labour government in 1979 has attracted little active support or funding from industry ministers.

Cable television, the ultimate product from the high-technology dream factory in Whitehall was to be given a new lease of life in 1982. Ministers inspired by the thought of recabling Britain and realizing the wired society" before the French of the Germans gave the technology every encouragement. There would be computers in homes linked to offices, banks, databanks...the promises were endless. The idea was given even more respectability by a report prepared for the Cabinet Office by the Information Technology Advisory Panel (ITAP).

Consortia fought for franchises to operate multichannel cable television services. Now the winners, complaining of a change in the law on leasing want to be given allowances-some want development grants to help their ventures. Supporting them with public money may do little to stimulate the British information

 Telecommunications. In the past three years the British telecommunications market was to be transformed through liberalization and that meant competition being encouraged to supply services and equipment. There is now only one carrier. Mercury, able to offer telephone services in compe-tition with British Telecom. No other competitor's licence is to be awarded until 1990, British Telecom still remains the dominant supplier of equipment in the market. Attempts by the British telecommunication manufacturers to convince government that BT should only be the guardian of the network have failed. • Education. The cuts were not meant to affect engineering or technology graduate education. In fact the numbers of these graduates in the last three years have been reduced by 9 per cent, Industry and education ministers are desperately trying to find a solution to the critical shortage of engineers and technicians in Britain.

Before Britain attends the next Economic Summit it should get its strategy on information technology correct. Maybe by then it will be more than just the rhetoric it has been in the past. The debate this week might Better way of taking blood pressure?

Some doctors now believe that computerized measurements of blood pressure are better than the traditional methods we are familiar with. The computer method is becoming more attractive to the medical profession because it eliminates most of the observer error by a harassed doctor. In the past, arguments against such "nawfangled" devices were directed at the cost and possible early machines.

But a new survey carried out by the Medical Research Council's Mild Hypertension Unit has found the computerized system to be satisfactory. And the unit admits that the diagnosis of high blood pressure on "casual" recordings in n doctor's surgery often leads to unnecessary lifelong treatment. In the MRC trial 31 patients were nvited to take home the computertitled blood-pressure device so they could take measurements over a 24-hour period. The aim is to provide an accurate reading to be compared with the a 'aliminate any error procedure is a

Titans clash over the PC market

Telecommunications giant AT & T and computer giant IBM appear set for a head-on clash over the lucrative American personal-computer market although the real victims could be smaller manufacturers.

Market analysts say ATT, the country's biggest telecom-munications company, is widely expected in the industry to break into the market in the near future, possible by the end of the month. The effect of the ensuing crunch with IBAL the world's largest computer maker, could hurt smaller competitors, more, including Apple, the number-two PC manufacturer.

AT & T's offering is almost certain to be the italian company Olivetti's M-24, or portable M-21, which is already on sale in Europe, the analysts say. AT & T holds a 25 per cent stake in Olivetti. Last month executives of the Italian company said AT & T had agreed to distribute $250m (about £178m) worth of its office products in financial clout and recognition.

18M last week announced that it would cut prices by between 18 and 23 per cent. One financial analyst in the US. Douglas Cuyae, even suggested this may have been in part to make AT & T's entrance more difficult. But other analysts say a launch would probably put more pressure on the many manufacturers of IBM-compatible systems than on IBM itself.

If AT & T offers an attractive price, buyers who may be reluctant to invest in a product made by a little-known company in an industry which has had more than its share of failures could see AT & T as the best alternative to IBM. It is also suggested that since IBM is well established among corporate users, AT & T would probably have its biggest success with smaller businesses, traditionally the customers of Apple.

Apple has already said it does not plan any price cuts in response. If AT & T comes into the market at 10 to 15 per cest con Apple, there could well be

British firm reveals its Soviet link-up

British firm, Quest Automation, is involved in developing advanced computer systems in the Soviet Union despite rising US displeasure over the West's actual exports, in the form of hardware, or the transfer of less tangible ideas, or software, to the Eastern Block.

Now Quest has revealed that, since 1982, it has been jointly developing computer-aided design (CAD) systems together with the Soviet Ministry of Automation, or MinPriborg. The company intends to market CAD systems for manufacturing, building and general design together with the largest Soviet computer firm, Electroorgtechnika.

A US Customs Department official said in London that though trade with the Eastern Block was legal for some computers, "when you get into the area of information or software it's like trying to catch smoke." The Americans' subsequent attempts to influence the affairs of British computer firms has created a major political row. Jim McShane, an assistant attache in the Customs Department, said that the US "never intended to stop legal trade," but added that when it came to the information contained wihin software, or computer programs, it was difficult to define

The Soviet's are not only keen to catch up but also to work alongside and to trade in the predominantly western computer industry. Tony Ebel, Quest's managing director, described how two of his staff were working with MinPriborg, in Moscow, on their next CAD system. He said: "I think there are pleaty of opportunities for UK companies to expand their relationships with the Soviet Union and to find success,

Rather unusually, the next computer systems on which Quest's CAD software works were actually designed with the Eastern block in mind. It was designed to fit in with the Cocom - the West's coordinating committee on computer export rules, Mr Ebel said. "We started with what was permissible and designed a computer to fit!"

Quest does realize that its close relationship with the Soviets could bring problems in the future. The Sovets are now trying to move from the old-fashioned, 16bit PDP11 computers forwards to DEC's latest 32-bit VAX range of equipment.

No longer the soft option, but an exciting challenge to your innovative skills.

With the rapidly increasing sophistication of microprocessor applications, software engineering is now one of the fastest growing and most technically and intellectually stimulating areas of technology around

And nowhere is there more scope to play a major role in developing software science to its limit than at Burroughs Livingston, where we produce a wide range of top selling computerised document processing equipment among the most advanced of its kind anywhere.

Rapidly evolving applications for our products means that we need to maintain our position as leaders in innovative research and development. We are now looking for additional software specialists to join teams working in such areas as Datacom, Evaluation and Firmware. Men and women up to Section Head level (minimum 8 years relevant experience) as well as Senior Programmers (minimum 5 years relevant experience) who can make a very real and positive contribution to our future success in a fast expanding development environment, particularly:

DATACOM Section Head

This role will involve co-ordinating the design and implementation of communication protocols with other members of the development team. It will also carry responsibility for supervising a team, co-ordinating resources and participating in long term planning and evaluation of future datacom development. A degree or equivalent is required together with knowledge of poll/select protocol and preferably SNA.

EVALUATION Section Head

To manage a small team working on software design verification and evaluation of completed systems. Also the development and design of test tools and performance evaluation.

A degree level qualification is required and a background in firmware would also be useful.

FIRMWARE Section Head

To manage a small team engaged in the development. of firmware and VO systems to support real time applications. It will also involve liaison with hardware engineering on the development of interface and the customisation of systems for specific user requirements. A minimum of a degree level qualification is required.

Opportunities also exist for staff at Programmer level in the above areas. Relevant experience with at least a degree level qualification are required.

So, take a hard look at your software career. If you are not making the progress you think you deserve and are ready to develop your specialist skills, join us here at Burroughs Livingston.

We can offer you a highly competitive salary and the sort of benefits you'd expect from a leader in the industry. including assistance with relocation to this particularly pleasant area of Central Scotland.

England have little to build on before the return of the great Test mismatch

EDGBASTON: West Indies beat England by an innings and 180 runs.

England's beating by West Indies in the first Test match yesterday, sponsored by Cornhill, was not quite the worst, statistically, which they have suffered at home. At Lord's in 1973 West Indies overwhelmed then by an innings and 226 rurs, winning just before three o'clock on the fourth afternoon, it was just before two o'clock when they won now, also with a day to great the state of the stat with a day to spare.

In a sense, England's 1973 defeat was far less understandable. For one was far less inderstandable. For one thing, they had a full complement of players to choose from; for another, they were being led, not by a new and inexperienced captain, but by Illingworth, who was widely recognized as an astute tactician. Illingworth's attack of himself, Willis, Arnold, Underwood and Greig was infinitely stronger than Gower's, and the West Indian bowling was nothing like as formidable as it is today.

Gower considers it an advantage that his players, henceforth, will be mre fully aware of what their task involves: "We have a week in which to sort ourselves out before getting mether again and thinking about it ollectively". Clive Lloyd thought it would be unwise to assess the sup-between the two sides after what happened here. The fact is, though, that of their last four Tests, West Indies have won two by an innings and the other two by 10 wickets.

Any hopes England had of making them work up any sort of a sweat yesterday rested with Botham. Had he really sparked, with Downton keeping him company, wonderful things could have happened. There is nothing that Botham is not still capable of with the hat, once he gets in though if he the bat, once he gets in, though if he is to do that he has to be prepared, at any rate to start with, to compromise his wilder instincts. He began yesterday as though to do so, which was more than could be said on Saturday evening when be came in. He hit one marvellous cover drive off Marshall, as

The players are primarily responsible. But, as far as conduct is concerned, no other sport is so disgracafully mismanaged by bungling administrators and chickenhearted officials. That does not apply to all administrators and the concerned of the content of the con sapped not only by a few boorish, load-mouthed bullies who are supposed to be playing termis, but also by the interference of tournament officials? The umpires are an amiable lot but, in many cases, too

This weakness is encouraged by a reasonable suspicion that firm handling of a match may not have the backing of the referee or the ent staff, but it applies to far Whatever happened to Beatrice eal, who called Pancho Gonzales's blaff at Queen's Club in 1972? Goszales wanted a line-judge changed. Mrs Seal, the referee, refused to ablige, Goszales would not play on unless he had his way. In Let us take a few examples. Frank Hammond, umpiring at the 1979

United States championships, correctly applied the point penalty system, disqualified life Nastase, but was overraled by the tournament that case, said Mrs Seal, the match was over - and it was, too. There was director and supervisor, and re-placed in the chair by the referee. Nastase and Arthur Ashe were both disqualified during the 1975 Mas-ters toursament in Stockholm, but disqualification or a retirement, but the principle was the same: the referee was in charge, not the player. In those days referees had

Jack Stahr disqualified Paul Ramirez during the 1976 Masters in Houston but Ramirez was re-instated, within the hour, at the behest of tournament big noises. Last year, at Wimbledon, Malcolm Last year, at Wimhledon, Malcolm Hantington benalised McEnroe but was overruled by the referee. Need I go on? Umpires can never be surwhen the rug will be yanked from under them.

Offences under the code of conduct fall into five basic categories: exceeding the 30 seconds allowed between points (90 seconds allowed between points during changeovers); audible or visible obscenities; "abuse" of balls, racket or court equipment; verbal or physical abuse; and unsportsman-like conduct.

In addition, a single fragrant offence can earn a player instant disqualification. This system is imperfect but good enough. Are there men with the guts to apply and uphold it, or must we send out a search party for Beatrice Seal?

Rankings dictate seedings

Wimbledon has taken the easy way out thus avoiding any resentful reperunsions from the players, by using the world unkings as seedings for the championships, which begin next Monday (rex Bellamy writes). The lists mostly make sense, anyway, though fifth is a high seeding for Jimmy Arias, who will be competing for the first time. Neither of last year's runners-up is included: Chris Lewis because his ranking is too low, and Andrea Jaeger, because she is having a break from the game. The predicted finals are John McEnsoe v Ivan Lendl, and Martina Navratilova v Chris Lloyd, Seedings for the mixed doubles will be decided today. and S Denton (US): British seeder 15, G Dowleswell and V Winbsty (US). Luck turns for Miss Barker

Sue Barker ended a run of first round defeats when she beat Sandy Collins, of Texas, 1-6, 6-4, 11-9 in sored by Carisberg, at Eastbourne yesterday.

Victory was so unfamiliar that she skirted warily around it, missing chances to finish her opponent off twice at 5-2 in the fund art and again at 9-3 and 10-9. Both match points at 5-2 were squandered by Miss Barker's double faults, of which she served three in that game. She admitted that she shook with fear that I was actually going to win a match", she said.

She had to wait 13 more games to do so and her win eventually took her two hours and 10 minutes. The big forehand that used to be the tennis equivalent of Henry Cooper's left hook was not often on target. She now plays Helens Sukova, of Miss Barker was one of a string of teams to be involved in eight men's and five women's divisions.

The total number of league matches to be played will be a record 2,340. The English Volleyball Association is already thinking in terms of expanding the league from 10 to 12 teams per division, while another possibility is a play-off series at the end of the season among the leading sides.

Next year, the EVA will be devoting special attention to junior development, which will also get its development, which will also get its share of the Britisic money, amounting to around £30,000 over three years. Robson round in a circle only to come back to square one

From Staart Jones, Football Correspondent, Santiago

Bobby Robson has gone round in huge South American circle. He Uruguayans proved to him how across the Continent over the last forthight and the answers to his problems remain as illusive as Ronnie Biggs. He may now go back to where he started when he begins his journey towards Mexico and the next World Cup.

The tour has not been a failure. Far from it. Robson came out here with so many novices that he had no right to expect anything other than three defeats. The opening victory over Brazil in the famous Maracana Stadium was, therefore, much more than an historic occasion, It lifted everyone's sights and spirits.

The subsequent loss in Uruguay and the draw here in Caile lowered them on to a more realistic level. It is important to remember, after all, that all three opponents were so far below full strength that they might as well have been called reserves. So, Robson could add, might his that were unavailable, are flawed in one way or another. Either their potential has yet to be fulfilled or their ability falls short of the required standard.

England's manager may have a wide field of choices but he can do nothing to improve the quality. At least, through adversity, he has been given the opportunity to look at promising youngsters such as Fenwick, Watson, Hateley and Allen. But for injuries, none of them would have been selected.

In Robson's end-of-term report, Fenwick has emerged as the most likely chadidate for the immediate future. "He has improved with each game. He is a good competitor, a good tourist, and a very good player who would never let me down. He has put himself on the list of possibilities over the next two years during the World Cap qualifying

There is no chance that France will be less than fully motivated today. They need a win to make sure of first place in their group.

The European football mion (UEFA) have turned down France's appeal against the three-match suspension being served by Manuel Amores, the defender who batted Jesper Olsen of Denuark during the anoning marrix last Tuesday. la their two European Champion ha their two karopean Champon-hip games as far, the Yugoslavs have not scored a goal and have conceded seven. Todor Veschinovic, their manager, has succumbed to stress and exhaustion and was admitted to hospital after the 5-0 defeat by Denmark.
France have established themselves as favourites to win the opening march last Toesday.

Carl Lewis took one more step towards emulating Jesse Owens's feat of winning four gold medals at the same Olympic Games (in 1936) when his win in the United States Olympic 100 metres trial on Sunday earned him selection for the short sprint and the 4 + 100 metres relay in Los Angeles this summer. Lewis's time of 10.06 sec was all

Lewis's time of 10.06 sec was all the more impressive for being run into a 2.4 metres per second headwind. Calvin Smith, the world record holder at 9.93sec, was the first casualty of the "first three" policy, but his fourth place, in 10.29sec, gained him the last spot in the relay. Lewis has the 200 metres and long imm to come later this and long jump to come later this

Edwin Moses, none of whose predecessors can justifiably be compared with him, won his semifinal of the 400 metres hurdles - his 101st successive victory - in 47.58sec, a time only he has beaten. But Danny Harris, 18 years old, in limshing second to Moses, ran a world junior best of 48.02sec, Sieve Ovett and Zola Budd are unlikely to face strong opposition in the Dale Farm Games in Belfast this evening. Miss Budd is running a 3,000 metres before her 1,500 metres for England in Birmingham on Saturday, but Ovett needs to consider whether he should go for a fast 800 metres time, to justify missing next weekend's AAA championships 800, which is effectively the Olympic trial for the last place in the team.

Brian Hooper, a former British record holder in the pole vault, has finally heen cleared to compete next weekend, after agreeing to pay an undisclosed sum, that he won in the television Superstars programme, into a trust fund, to protect his Luxembourg "He must improve his first touch and his finishing" Robson noted of Hateley. Allen's introduction Allen's introduction could scarcely have been less striking. Few defenders could match him on the turn but, having created opportunities for himself, he failed to make what might have been an astonishing start to his international career. By his own admission, he could have scored five goals against Uruguay, and claimed another five against Chile.

There lies Robson's main worry, Having dared to use an adventurous

Having dared to use an adventurous system, his team created more chances than he expected but also missed too many. "Some times that one player can make all the difference Look at Rummeninge, of More Company and More an difference, Look at Rummeninge, of West Germany, and Platini, of France. Without them, those two nations would be scratching their

"In England we haven't got a consistent taker of half-chances. That is why Jimmy Greaves was so special." He thought that if Woodcock and Mariner had been leading the attack on Sunday, England would have beaten Chile by a convincing margin. He pointed a convincing margin, He pointed out that there were 20 genuine goal-out that there were 20 genuine goal-scoring openings."

There is also a deficiency of wingers. After performing so brilliantly against Brazil, Barnes was "asking the Urugusyans to queue up so that he could take them on". Although he can be irritatingly lethargic (his contribution against Chile was almost regligible), he has more natural talent than Chamber-lain, who relies more on sheer speed.

Robson would have no hesitation Robson would have no hesitation is selecting two wingers again "as long as they are good enough. But apart from those two, the only other two around are Wallace, of Southampton, and Callaghan, of Watter, if the fiank players are not right, then the 4-2-4 formation cannot be either."

He admitted unstanded that he

He admitted yesterday that he would not have picked the same team for a World Cup qualifying match. In September against East Germany, the last remaining dress rehearsal before the opening the against Finland the following month, he is likely to return to his more acknowleded strength. That would mean including probably only half the side that started in Santiago.

At Newbury last month, Wassi and Cormorant Wood dead-heated for the Lockinge Stakes, so there cannot be much between them at their best. Arguably a mile, which is the distance of today's race, suits Wassi the better.

Prince of Wales Stakes if only the ground were much softer, but on firmish going I prefer Morcon, who beat Adonijah when the conditions favoured the latter at Goodwood in May. Morgan's Choice, my selec-tion for the Ascot Stakes, had a good pipe-opener over a disiance that was much too short for him at Newbury last week and will be much more effective over today's course where he has won three times and over today's distance.

If Sandy Island wins the Ribblesdale Stakes, it will be the fifth time that Lord Howard de Walden, her owner and breeder has won the race. Whether his Lordship's dream of a nap, hand of victories in this race, after those of Ostrya, Parmelia Catalpa and Strida, comes true would appear to depend on whether the filly, who looks a trifle one-paced, can fend off the challenges that can be expected towards the end from both Out Of Shot and Ballinderry.

As Out Of Shot is anything but the easiest of rides, as was demonstrated quite clearly in the Oaks, in which she was disqualified from third place, I am only too happy to go along with Ballinderry, who finished third to the subsequent Oaks winner, Circus Plume, and another good filly, Leipzieg, in third place

From Barry Pickthall Newport, Rhode Island Hopes were fading last night for a British win in the Observer/Europe l

single-handed transatlantic race after a second French multi-hull slipped past Peter Phillip's Travac-

rest Seaway during the light airs that prevailed for much of Sunday night as the leading yachts slowly closed on the Newport finishing line.

The latest satellite position reports yesterday placed Philippe Poupon's 56-ft Shuttleworth-designed Fleury Michon, 157 miles from Newport line, 24 miles ahead of Marc Pajot's 60ft catamaran Elf

Phillips lost radio contact with the outside world shortly after the start at Plymouth on June 2 when the emergency halch fitted in the main hull of his trimaran opened inadvertently, allowing a shower of seawater to swamp his radio equipment. He was still unaware of the closeness of his French rivals last night, or the fact that he was now lying in third place. The question uppermost in the minds of the Royal Western Yacht

Club's race committee, however, is whether they should announce the first single-hander into Newport as

Their problem is that Yvon

Fauconnier, sailing the 54-ft trimaran Umupro Jardin (formerly Exmouth Challenge), is claiming a 16-hour time allowance at the sixteenin. Norman, playing one match ahead, hit his approach into the long grass surrounding the green. That, with his heart beginning to pound, he managed to chip from there to six feet from the hole was little short of a miracle.

Zoeller, too, played a miraculous shot. From 235 yards out, he hooked a three-iron around the towering trees and onto the green. So when Norman drove right behind a tree at the seventeenth, it

"I'd like to say that a worm popped its head out behind the ball," said Greg Norman, "but the truth is I choked." Thus, the Australian relived one of the most fascinating final holes in US Open history, a hole where he had sent the ball into the grandstand but then averted disaster with an audacious putt of 35 feet.

Minutes later, on a clammy Sunday afternoon, that putt proved sufficient to earn Norman a play-off over 18 holes holes against Fuzzy Zoeller. Both finished with an

Yet as these two popular contestants stepped onto the first tee of the West course at Winged Foot golf club yesterday. Norman was well aware, win or lose that he had emphasized his right to a major championship, after being twice behind with five to play and rescuing three holes for a final round of 69.

Plaxton's eagle eye

Jonathan Planton's victory in the Britishine Trophy on Sunday brought him his first national aniateur title since 1978, when he won the Carris Boy's event, A late 12th, an eagle from 20ft at the 17th and birdies at the 17th and 18th.

Zoeller, visiting a bunker, dropped a shot at that hole so now they were level. And, now, Norman knew he could win. But that was the thought of success momentarily

It was hardly surprising. He had been forced to call upon a reservoir of courage, and now, as he took a six iron back, the adrenalin was flowing too fast. He felt the force of it stiffen his muscles. He was unable to complete the backswing and he turned back into the ball far too quickly, sending it right into the third row of the grandstand.

Norman, after taking a free drop, pitched the ball 35 feet past the flag. From there, he caressed that putt at exactly the right speed so that with one final revolution, it tumbled into

 The process of warming us up for Wimbledon fortnight officially gets under way tonight: two documentaries, one from BBC TV, ambitiously spanning a century of tennis and concentrating on the women; the other, from Thames Television, spanning half a century, and concentrating on the men - and on one man in particular, PERRY (ITV, 10.30pm) has had a long gestation. It marks the 50th anniversary of Fred Perry's first Wimbledon victory. Luckly for everyone concerned, Mr Perry is till around, and able to give lan suit around, and able to give lan Littlesmith's film the first person singular touch. Luckily, too, no other Briton has won the men's singles since Mr Perry, so his glory remains uneclipsed by the passing years. And there will be a sympathetic response from all corners of the response from all corners of the British Isles to Mr Perry's

In his seventies, Mr Perry is no more concerned about projecting an attitude of mock modesty than he was in his twenties. "If you've got a was if his wettles. You will not find Fred Perry's picture in the spotting world's callege of will not little the renty spectre in the sporting world's gallery of reluctant heroes. THE WOMEN OF WIMBLEDON (BBC2, 8.10pm) as well as reminding us that British tennis has been more fortunate in its women singles finalists than in its men, also serves as a warning against making judgments that are as il-considered as they are sexist. Tennis, says the anonymous pundit who speaks through Peter Ustinov's lips, "affords the gentler sex a training in

Mr Ustinov, sometimes sporting Victorian straw boater and heavily-striped jacket, sometimes not, weaves in and out of Phil Pitley's and Graham Maughan's film in both the role of serious tennis fan and comical commentator ("the next thing the women will be asking for is the vote!"). One-stop support ships for Navy

By Philip Webster Political Reporter

The Government is going out to competitive tender for a new Royal Navy support vessel designed to carry both fixel and stores, and to replenish ships with them simultaneously.

It plans to build up to six Auxiliary Oiler Replenishment (AOR) vessels of about 30,000 tonnes and will shortly be inviting the industryu to submit proposals.

The concept of a "one-stop" support ship is new to the Royal Navy but already used by several navies around the world. The attraction is that by allowing ships to take on board stores, ammunition and fuel at the same time, rather than in separate operations as at present, the support vessels reduce the duration of risk.

The Government expects to place an order for the first next year and to have it in service by the end of the decade. It will have its own self-defence capability, including a vertical-launch Sea Wolf missile system, a helipad for helicopters landing from frigates and a helicopter of its own. It will work closely with the Navy's new Type 23

Mr Michael Heseltine, Secretary of State for Defence, announced details of what he described as a "new concept in ship procurement" at the start of a two-day Commons debate on the 1984 defence estimates.

It was the first time the Government had gone out to competition for proposals to design and then build the first class of a type of ship of such importance and complexity,

In a strong response to critics of the Trident system, Mr Heseltine said claims by its oponents that it represented an arms race, that the alternatives were more acceptable and that its cost would distort the rest of the defence programme, did not stand the test of analysis.

Referring to the estimate last week by the all-party Select Committee on Defence that Trident would cost £9.4m, nearly £700m more than the in the Defence White Paper, Mr Heseltine said it had focused attention on the exchange rate. There were other factors in the equation, he said. "I do not intend today to depart from convention and to introduce new figures

Then mounted officers were sent in again, and as the demonstrators retreated to stand their ground by the railway bridge, a cascade of bricks, bottles, iron bars and jagged glass descended on the heads of the advancing police-

The barricade, was still issuing acrid black smoke. At the back of it, a senior officer pointed to eight wooden stakes, their ends sharpened to points, set in stone and pointed towards the police line. "They were intended for the horses"

 Mr Neil Kinnock yesterday blamed the Government for the clashes at Orgreave and Mr Tony Benn described the scenes there as a pitched battle which smacked of civil war

The papers

The Daily Star, commenting on the teachers' strike, says that it is the ordinary families who are suffering the most. Working mums are either having to take time off to look after children who have been sent home, or pay someone to do it for them. It adds: "Isn't it time the teachers gave up instead of stepping up, this pointless and unpopular action?" The Daily Mirror commenting on

John McEnroe's bad behaviour on the tennis court, says. The pity is that the officials who run the sport are too scared to stand up to him. They let him get away with very blue murder. But if only one umpire had the spirit to announce "Mr McEnroe, you are disqualified", he would do more for the sport than any number of spoiled brats wield a racket."
